" For the eighteenth, it was not our fault that " could never have been ſecured, by declaring,

" that no member of either houſe, upon any
" accuſation of treaſon, could have his perſon
" ſeized without the conſent of that houſe of " That privilege of parliament extends not to " treaſon; and if it did, any member (the houſe

" being for a ſhort time adjourned, and ſo their " conſent not being ſo had) how treaſonable ſoever
" his intentions were, how clearly ſoever known,
" and how ſuddenly ſoever to be executed, muſt
" have fair leave given him to go on and purſue
" them; no way, how legal ſoever, after the

Remark (3) His Majeſty, in ſhewing the inconveniencies of this clauſe, lays down a caſe different from that of the ſix members accuſed. For he ſuppoſes, to demonſtrate theſe inconveniencies, that the treaſon is manifeſt, and juſt going to be executed: whereas the difference between him and his parliament conſiſted, in that the parliament deſired to ſee the proofs, before they conſented to the proſecution of their members. Beſide, this maxim, that the privileges of parliament extend not to treaſonable caſes, is very ambiguous: for it may ſignify, either that in caſe of real, manifeſt, or apparent treaſon, members of parliament have no more privilege than other ſubjects, or elſe that, by a bare accuſation of treaſon, true or falſe, a member may be commited to priſon like any other private perſon. Charles took it, and would have it taken, in this latter ſenſe, but the parliament would admit it only in the firſt. But that this Prince's underſtanding the paſſage was wrong, evidently appears, in that when, for inſtance, a peer is accuſed of treaſon, he is not ſent to the Tower, according to the uſual courſe of juſtice, as a private perſon would be, but by order of his houſe, which thinks proper to conſent to his proſecution. Without this conſent, the King cannot ſend him to the Tower by his own authority, and upon a bare accuſation. In fine, no fewer inconveniencies would attend his Majeſty's conſtruction of the words, ſince in that caſe the King, upon bare accuſations, true or falſe, might impriſon all the principal members of both houſes.

" To conclude, we conjure you, and all men,

" And being then confident, that the credit of " thoſe men who deſire a general combuſtion " will be ſo weakened with you, that they will " not be able to do this kingdom any more " harm, we ſhall be willing to grant our general " pardon, with ſuch exceptions as ſhall be thought " fit, and ſhall receive much more joy in the hope " of a full and conſtant happineſs of our people " in the true religion, and under the protection " of the law, by a bleſſed union between us and " our parliament (ſo much deſired by us) than " any ſuch increaſe of our revenue (how much " ſoever beyond former grants) as (when our ſub- " jects were wealthieſt) our parliament could have " ſetled upon us."

Remark on the preceding anſwer.

I ſhall make only a general remark on this his Majeſty's replication, and one which to me ſeems abſolutely neceſſary; viz. that all the begining, which includes two thirds, is intirely needleſs, ſince he treats not of the point in diſpute between him and the parliament. The queſtion was not to know, whether the laws aſcribed ſuch and ſuch power to the King; but to know, whether the King having abuſed this power, his promiſe that he would govern according to the law of England, was to be depended on thenceforwards. King Charles, throughout the preamble to his anſwer, ſuppoſes ignorance of what is due to a King of England, or a cauſeleſs denial thereof. With regard to the firſt point, he goes about to acquaint his people with the nature of the Engliſh conſtitution, which was quite needleſs, ſince none diſagreed with him in that reſpect. He keeps to the general poſition univerſally acknowledged, but ſays not a word to the particular queſtion, which was the ſole ſubject of diſpute. As to the ſecond point, he does not deny that he had abuſed his power, but makes no other anſwer to the conſequence drawn by the parliament from this abuſe, than that he promiſes better conduct for the future.

One may readily perceive, that neither the parliament's propoſitions, nor his Majeſty's anſwer, were proper to procure any accommodation: accordingly, it may be affirmed, that neither ſide thought of any ſuch matter. When the King publiſhed his anſwer, he had received ſome arms, ammunition and ordnance from Holland, and was moreover preparing to attack Hull. Tho' great part of that magazine was now removed to London, he hoped ſtill to find there arms, &c. ſufficient for his moſt urgent occaſions: beſide, this place, which was one of the ſtrongeſt in all England, could be of great ſervice to him, to keep the adjacent country in his intereſt.

The Preſbyterians motives in this rupture.

Contrariwiſe, the Preſbyterian party, who then prevailed in the parliament, had in a manner gained their point, I mean had brought matters to a rupture, which gave them room to hope, they ſhould ſoon have opportunity to accompliſh the reſt of their project. Indeed, this rupture between King and parliament being ſuppoſed, it was manifeſt, the realm was to be governed by parliament and King, ſeparately, and not jointly as before, i. e. they would each govern thoſe of their reſpective factions; in which caſe, the parliament would have no more occaſion for the conſent of his Majeſty, who would be looked on as a declared enemy, and conſequently, they might decree whatſoever they pleaſed, without oppoſition. This was preciſely the point to which the Preſbyterian party's whole procedure had tended, without however their diſcovering themſelves, any more than was neceſſary to ſupport the expectations of their adherents: for, 'till now, it highly concerned them to make the public, and ſuch members as were not of their ſide, believe they acted in conjunction with the other members, ſolely with a view of vindicating the common liberty againſt King Charles's incroachments.

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

Double views of the Preſbyterians.

Certain it is, there was in this parliament, from its begining, a Preſbyterian party, whoſe aim was to alter church-government: but that this was the Preſbyterians ſole aim, as many aſſert, is what does not to me appear evident. Why might not theſe men, in ſtriving to erect their diſcipline on the church's ruin, have another end, I mean, the prevention of Charles and his party's incroachments upon the public liberty? Moſt aſſuredly, many of this very parliament's members were far enough from being Preſbyterians, and yet had the ſame end. Why might not likewiſe the Preſbyterians have it, jointly with that which was peculiar to them? Is it ſo uncommon to ſee people propoſing to themſelves two different ends in one and the ſame undertaking? In reality, I ſee not the improbability of ſuch a ſuppoſition. The Preſbyterian party therefore muſt be conſidered as acting with thoſe views; and this is ſo true, that undeniable proofs of it will appear in the ſequel of this reign. But their adverſaries have been pleaſed to aſcribe to them the firſt only, in order to charge them with inflaming the kingdom, for the ſake of eſtabliſhing Preſbytery in the church. I do not deny, that this motive greatly contributed towards it: but it does not follow, that the reaſons whereon the parliament refuſed to confide in this Prince were frivolous. The contrary may be rather infered; for if theſe reaſons had not been plauſible, the Preſbyterians would never have been able to execute their projects, and form ſo powerful a faction in a kingdom where, at the begining of this parliament, they made ſo inconſiderable a figure: but they politicly made uſe of the general diſcontent, which actually ſubſiſted, to bring matters to the point they deſired. They cannot be ſaid to have actually cauſed this univerſal diſcontent, tho' it is certain they helped to inflame it, becauſe it was neceſſary to their purpoſes.

Order of the houſe concerning the crown jewels made away. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 736. June 2. Charles receives arms from Holland. p. 601. Clarendon, p. 497, 520, 521.

The parliament having received advice from Holland, that the Queen had pawned or ſold ſome of the crown-jewels at Amſterdam, publiſhed, the ſecond of June, an order declaring, that whoſoever was concerned in the ſelling or pawning thoſe jewels, or in bringing the King any money by way of bill of exchange, or otherwiſe, ſhould be accounted an enemy to the ſtate. But her Majeſty had already diſpoſed of that money in purchaſing arms and ammunition, which ſhe had conveyed to the King, in a ſmall ſhip named the Providence, which, that very day the parliament publiſhed this order, ſafely arrived in Burlington bay, after having been hotly chaſed by part of the parliament's fleet, commanded by the earl of Warwick.

He injoins his partiſans to leave the parliament.

Not long before this, Charles, finding a war unavoidable, had ordered his friends, in both houſes, to abſent themſelves from the parliament. He hoped, by leſſening ſo conſiderably the number of members, to leſſen the parliament's credit: but this policy turned not to his advantage. It is true, both houſes were not a little diminiſhed, as to number: but withal, the King's party there became ſo weak, that they could no longer oppoſe the reſolutions taken againſt him. Tho' the two houſes regreted not their being rid of theſe ſpies, they however believed, it was neceſſary to take ſome meaſures, either to hinder a greater deſertion, or to convince the public, that it was not their fault if the parliament was not ſo numerous as before. The commons therefore injoined all the ſherifs in England to ſummon the repreſentatives, to attend the houſe by the ſixteenth of June, on forfeiture of a hundred pounds *, and on pain of undergoing ſuch farther puniſhment as the houſe ſhould judge proper.

Severity of the peers againſt nine abſent lords. July 20. p. 737, 742. Clarendon, p. 503.

But the lords went ſtill farther; for they ordered nine of their members (1), gone to the King at York, to appear at their bar, the eighth of June, as delinquents. Theſe nine peers having ſent their excuſe by a letter, the commons inſtantly drew up a formal impeachment againſt them, and ſent it up to their lordſhips. The twenty-ſeventh of the ſame month, they pronounced ſentence againſt the nine lords, declaring, they ſhould not ſit or vote in the houſe during the preſent parliament, and ſhould ſtand commited to the Tower during the houſe's pleaſure.

The parliament takes up money upon loans. June 10. Ibid. Ruſhworth. Vol. IV. p. 743. T. May. Manley.

Theſe were little preludes to the war which was ſoon after to break out. But, on the tenth of June, both houſes gave a more manifeſt confirmation of their deſign; for, upon receiving advice that the King was actually giving out commiſſions to levy forces, they publiſhed propoſals for bringing in money or plate, for defenſe of the kingdom (2). This is what King Charles's friends will have to be conſidered as the firſt declaration of war on the parliament's ſide, and pretend thereby to demonſtrate, that both houſes were the aggreſſors. But it is certain, this Prince had long before taken meaſures to prepare for war, and the parliament had doubtleſs done the like, tho' perhaps more ſecretly than his Majeſty. Howſoever this be, after having ſeen what were the true grounds and cauſes of the war, it ſeems of little moment to know which of the two parties firſt diſcovered the meaſures taken, whether to attack or defend: for that is the utmoſt meaning of that grand queſtion, 'Which of the parties "began the war?"

Charles's letter to the mayor of London. June 14. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 746.

King Charles, having notice of what both houſes had done for the ſpeedy raiſing of money, wrote to the lord-mayor of London, commanding him to publiſh his letter, wherein he inhibited the citizens to lend the parliament any money. This letter occaſioned the two houſes publiſhing a declaration, the aim whereof was to ſhew the people, that the parliament was under abſolute neceſſity of preparing for their defenſe. They ſaid, his Majeſty having ſo often threatened them about Hull and the militia, they could not but conſider his preparations as a deſign to levy war againſt his parliament.

The King's anſwer. p. 748.

The King made to this declaration a long anſwer, abounding with reproaches of the illegal proceedings of both houſes againſt him. He denied not his intending to have juſtice in the caſes of Hull and the militia, or loſing his life in requiring it; and affirmed, that this was no proof of a deſign to make war againſt the parliament, but only of his intention to defend himſelf againſt their attacks. The parliament, on their part, ſaid the ſame, and each indeavored to caſt all blame of the war on the oppoſite party. I do not think it neceſſary to inſert theſe laſt papers, there being nothing new in them. They contain the ſame reproaches, and the ſame vindications on both ſides, as were ſeen in the former declarations. I ſhall only obſerve, that even when the war was on the point of commencing, and there was no farther hope of any accommodation, King Charles thought it very ſtrange, that his prerogatives ſhould be violated, and the parliament raiſe forces without his approbation. He conſtantly uſed the ſame ſtile, even when hoſtilities were at the utmoſt height. In fine, the parliament, weary of theſe paper ſkirmiſhes, of which there was no end, and which conſumed much time, did by a printed order prohibit publiſhing, in the King's name, any declarations or papers, which ſhould be contrary to the parliament's ordinance. After that, there was no hope of peace, and accordingly all thoughts of it were laid aſide, by both parties.

Charles I An' 1442.

The parliament forbids publiſhing the King's papers. July 4. p. 751.

Charles, before he came to any open declaration, had a mind to execute two deſigns he had formed. The firſt was to get poſſeſſion of the fleet; the ſecond, to beſiege Hull. The project of the fleet was ſolely founded in the expectation that the captains would declare for him as ſoon as commanded. In this belief, he wrote to each captain in particular, requiring him, without delay, and without demanding the orders of his ſuperiors, to bring away his ſhip to Burlington bay, and yield no farther obedience to the earl of Warwick. He ſent withal a letter to the earl of Warwick, to diſcharge him from the command of the fleet. The letters to the captains were to be delivered, as indeed they were, before that directed to the earl of Warwick. His Majeſty, at the ſame time, diſpatched a meſſenger to London, to carry the earl of Northumberland a revocation, under the great-ſeal, of his commiſſion of admiral. The earl of Warwick, who was then aſhore, having notice of what paſſed in the fleet, went immediately aboard his ſhip, and ſummoned all the captains to attend him at a council of war. All obeyed, notwithſtanding the King's orders, except five, who united to make their defenſe, in caſe they ſhould be attacked: the reſt proteſted to their admiral, they would obey his commands. Immediately on his having ſecured theſe, he made them caſt anchor round the five others, in order to force their ſubmiſſion: but three thought fit to come in upon a ſummons. Two ſtill remained obſtinate; yet ſoon after ſuffered themſelves to be ſhamefully taken by unarmed boats, and were ſent to London. Thus was Charles diſappointed of his aim, for which, tho' of great importance, he undoubtedly had not taken very proper meaſures, as appeared by the event (3).

After this fruitleſs attempt, his Majeſty believed it in vain to diſſemble any longer, and that he muſt now commence war. To that end, he ordered the earl of Newcaſtle to ſecure the town of Newcaſtle; which was performed, tho' with ſome difficulty, and then he cauſed alſo Tinmouth caſtle to be ſeized. At the ſame time, he ſent away a good number of nobility and gentry into their reſpective ſhires to levy forces, and, by a patent under the great ſeal, appointed the earl of

Hertford,

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

Hertford, his lieutenant-general of the weſtern counties. He kept near his perſon the earl of Lindſey, to be general of his army under himſelf. Sir Jacob Aſhley was general of the infantry; and the poſt of general of the cavalry was reſerved for Prince Rupert, his Majeſty's nephew and the elector Palatine's brother, who was daily expected.

He marches to beſiege Hull. p. 528. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 601, 610.

Tho' King Charles had pretended to raiſe only a guard for his perſon, it however appeared that, very early in July, he had about three thouſand foot, and ſeven or eight hundred horſe, with which he determined on marching to Hull. He ſtayed ſome days at Beverley, and iſſued a proclamation ſignifying his intention to beſiege Hull, and the reaſons which induced him thereto; which reaſons having already been mentioned, it is needleſs to repeat them. Three days after, he ſent this proclamation to the parliament, with a meſſage, requiring that the town of Hull might be inſtantly delivered him.

The parliament's petition to Charles. July 15. p. 603.

Before the parliament received this meſſage, they had reſolved on petitioning his Majeſty, in a very humble manner, to forbear all preparations for war; to remove his forces from about Hull; to diſmiſs his troops; to ſend away his gariſons from Newcaſtle, Tinmouth, and other places; for which they likewiſe promiſed on their part, to diſcontinue all the preparations they had been forced to make for their defenſe.

His anſwer. p. 605. Clarendon, p. 530, 531.

Charles returned a long anſwer in writing to this petition, wherein he repeated great part of what he had ſaid in his declarations. He withal made certain propoſitions to both houſes, allowing them to the twenty-ſeventh of July for a full and poſitive anſwer.

He beſieges Hull in vain. p. 549. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 617.

The parliament having made a no very ſatisfactory anſwer to the propoſitions, Charles reſolved to commence the ſiege of Hull. But this enterpriſe was ſo unſucceſsful that, after having been ſome time before the town without making any progreſs, he was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, or rather blocade, and return to York. Lord Clarendon ſays, his Majeſty untertook the ſiege of Hull, upon the aſſurance given him by ſir John Hotham, that he would ſurrender the town at the firſt ſhot, but that it was not poſſible for Hotham to anſwer his promiſe (1).

Goring, governor of Portſmouth, declares for the King. p. 550. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 683.

Charles had, as I obſerved, ſome months ſince gained colonel Goring, governor of Portſmouth, who, feigning to keep the place for the parliament, held it in reality for his Majeſty. He received from both parties money, to reinforce the gariſon and raiſe new works; the parliament not miſtruſting him, and Charles relying on his promiſe. At length, about the time Charles lay before Hull, Goring openly declared for him. This happened in the begining of Auguſt, only three weeks after the parliament had iſſued orders for levying an army, to be commanded by the earl of Eſſex. This army not being yet ready, both houſes, tho' aſtoniſhed at Goring's defection, were not however diſcouraged. As it was of the utmoſt importance to recover this place (the ſtrongeſt in all England) before Charles ſhould be able to relieve it, they haſtily diſpatched a commitee, whom they impowered to aſſemble the militia of the neighboring counties, to inveſt Portſmouth by land, while the earl of Warwick, by their order, blocked it up by ſea. Happily for the parliament, Goring, tho' he had received from them three thouſand pounds, and a like ſum from his Majeſty, had neglected to lay in the neceſſary proviſions for a ſiege, and particularly corn and ſalt, ſo that in the very begining of the blocade he perceived, he could not make a very long reſiſtance. This made him determine on capitulating. He ſurrendered the place to the commitee, only for liberty to return into Holland*.

He is blocked up;

and capitulates.

* And that his officers ſhould repair to his Majeſty.

During the blocade of Portſmouth, Charles, not doubting but Goring was in condition to defend that place, finally publiſhed a declaration which had long been prepared, wherein he enumerates all the complaints he had already made againſt both houſes. As the reader is ſufficiently informed, there is no occaſion to inſert here this new declaration: only it muſt be remarked, that the King declared both houſes guilty of high-treaſon, and forbid all his ſubjects to obey them. At the ſame time was likewiſe iſſued a proclamation, requiring all men who could bear arms, to repair to him, by the twenty-fifth of Auguſt, at Notingham, where he intended to ſet up his royal ſtandard, which all good ſubjects were obliged to attend. The ſeting up the royal ſtandard was the ancient manner of making known to the people the King's urgent occaſion for their aid, and the place to which they were to repair to aſſiſt him. King Charles could not forbear thinking, he was ſtill to be conſidered as other Kings, and to have the ſame reſpect and obedience paid him, as if he had never given his people any cauſe of complaint. He imagined, that the acts of grace he had paſſed in this parliament, and his promiſes of better conduct for the future, had effaced all the impreſſions made on his ſubjects by his former adminiſtration, and that, tho' there was a potent faction againſt him in the parliament, it was among the people quite otherwiſe. He therefore thought the erecting his ſtandard would make a ſtrong impreſſion on his people, and induce them to appear in arms at Notingham: but the prejudices were too deeply rooted in moſt of his ſubjects minds for a bare ceremony to remove them.

Proclamation to attend the royal ſtandard. p. 774. Clarendon, p. 559.

While the day appointed for erecting the ſtandard was expected, Charles indeavored to augment the number of his forces. He gave out freſh commiſſions, and ſent the earl of Hertford, and ſome others to manage his concerns, and raiſe troops, in the weſtern parts. For himſelf, he departed York ſome days before the twenty-fifth of Auguſt, and in his way he took Lincoln, whence he took the arms of the trained-bands for his troops, after which he came to Notingham, and next day reviewed his cavalry.

No ſooner was the review over, but he was informed that two regiments of foot were marching to Coventry, by the earl of Eſſex's orders. He thereupon haſted thither with his cavalry, ſeven or eight hundred ſtrong, in hopes of preventing the parliament's forces, and poſſeſſing himſelf of that city. Accordingly he arrived there a day before thoſe two regiments: but the mayor of that city, tho' without a gariſon, ſhut the gates againſt him, and fired upon his followers. He was very ſenſibly touched with this indignity; but as there was no remedy, he was forced to return to Notingham, leaving the command of his cavalry to commiſſary-general Wilmot.

Wilmot, it ſeemed, could not have wiſhed for a fairer opportunity to attack with advantage this body of infantry, who had nothing to ſecure them: but, for what reaſon it is not known, inſtead of attacking the enemies, he thought only of avoiding them, and even retreated with ſome precipitation. This was a bad omen to a war juſt commenced.

Finally, on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt, King Charles cauſed his ſtandard to be erected on a turret in Nottingham caſtle (1), having with him only ſome militia unarmed. His proclamation had produced ſo little effect, that few were come to attend the royal ſtandard: nay, it happened, that very day the ſtandard was erected, to grow ſo tempeſtuous, that it was blown down, and could not be fixed again in a day or two. This was looked on by many as a very inauſpicious omen.

BOOK XXI.

Containing the third and laſt Part of King CHARLES I's Reign.

Aug. 2. Charles's condition at Nottingham. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 1, &c.

KING Charles had imagined, that the erecting his ſtandard would draw great numbers of people to Nottingham, preſſing to offer him their ſervice: but he was greatly diſappointed. He had with him only three hundred foot, and a few of the militia, amaſſed by the ſheriff * of that county. His cavalry conſiſted of no more than eight hundred, and his artillery was ſtill at York, whence it was difficult to bring it, many things being yet wanted to prepare and form it for marching, nor was there any infantry to guard it. Nevertheleſs, as he had given out many commiſſions, and ordered his forces ſhould repair to Nottingham, he expected them in that town, tho' not without danger, the parliament having at Coventry five thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe. Thus was his Majeſty in a very melancholy ſituation before the war was well commenced. He had appointed Robert Bartu, earl of Lindſey, for general; but had yet no army. Their Highneſſes Rupert and Maurice, his nephews, the elector Palatine's brothers, being come to offer him their ſervice early in September, he made Prince Rupert general of his horſe, quartered at Leiceſter, whither repaired his ſaid Highneſs, and took on him the command.

* Sir John Digby.

T. May.

He is in great danger. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 5.

Moſt certainly, his Majeſty was in extreme danger at Nottingham. This town was not in condition to make a long reſiſtance, and his forces being ſo very inconſiderable, ſhould the parliament's troops, which were within twenty miles of that place, have marched directly to him, he muſt have been forced to retire with diſhonor to York, except he would have hazarded his being made priſoner. All thoſe about him ſaw the danger, it being ſo evident; but it was not eaſy to avoid it, without quiting Nottingham, which muſt have been to him very prejudicial. For this reaſon, it was moved in council, to ſend a meſſage to both houſes, with ſome overture to incline them to a treaty. The intent of this propoſition, was doubtleſs to give this Monarch intimation, that his affairs were in ſuch a poſture, that peace alone could free him from his imbarraſs, and the danger to which he lay expoſed: but the mover of this advice could ſcarcely imagine, that a bare offer of peace was ſufficient to procure it, after what had paſſed before the rupture. Very likely therefore, his deſign was that, in propoſing a peace, ſomething more ſhould be offered, than what had been offered already. Charles readily took the hint, and was thereat ſo offended, that he broke up the council, to prevent its being further urged.

His council adviſe him to propoſe a peace.

He refuſes, Ibid.

However, next day the ſame motion was renewed, but under a different view. As it was doubtleſs perceived, that what had given him offenſe, was the plain meaning of propoſing a peace, viz. that he muſt depart from ſome of his pretenſions, care was taken to remove this deteſted meaning, and it was adviſed only to ſend a meſſage to both houſes, in order to gain time. His Majeſty ſtill oppoſed it, alleging, that to offer peace at ſuch a juncture, would be diſcovering his weakneſs: that his enemies would reject the offer with inſolence, and nothing but diſhonor would thereby reflect on himſelf. But it was repreſented to him, ſuch a meſſage might do good, but could do no harm: that indeed, both houſes would very probably reject the offer, but they would thereby render themſelves odious to the people, who were deſirous of peace, and who would be the more inclined to ſerve his Majeſty, for his indeavors to procure it: that if the overture was accepted, he would have opportunity of demonſtrating, that the war, on his part, was purely defenſive: in fine; that the bare offer of peace would of courſe retard the parliament's preparations, becauſe peoples minds would be in ſuſpenſe, while the King's levies might be continued by virtue of the commiſſions already ſent out.

He is adviſed to propoſe a peace, upon the likelihood of its being rejected. Ibid.

Reaſons to back the advice.

King Charles yielded to theſe reaſons, becauſe the point was not to offer any new conditions, but only to lay a ſnare for the parliament, and retard their preparations. This was the ſole motive of that meſſage, wherein, as we ſhall ſoon find, Charles propoſed nothing new, and which he nevertheleſs repreſented afterwards as a manifeſt ſign of his ſincere deſire desire of peace. But tho' ſome pretend that his Majeſty's meſſage, and the parliament's refuſal, greatly contributed to facilitate that Prince's levies, and undeceive people of their good opinion of the intentions of both houſes, I cannot believe, that reaſons ſo weak were able to produce ſuch great effects. It is true, if by the word people, are to be underſtood Charles's devotees only, it is not unlikely, that the refuſal of peace might render the parliament odious to them, and promote their taking arms for his Majeſty; but if by people, be underſtood the parliament's faction, or rather indiſcriminately the whole people; it is not eaſy to conceive, how the refuſal of a bare propoſition, without any thing new in it, could produce any ſuch effect. Undoubtedly, the nation wiſhed for peace rather than war: but they would have a ſolid peace, ſupported by other foundations than the King's bare word, and not a peace in general, ſuch as his Majeſty propoſed. They had already rejected ſuch a peace; and upon this ſenſe of the nation it was, that the parliament's whole authority was founded. This was no novelty; it had been long diſputed without coming to any concluſion. How therefore could the bare propoſal of a treaty, without any particular offer, incline the people ſo ſtrongly to the King, and render the parliament more odious, if it was rejected? And yet, upon this foundation Charles did conſtantly build, from the begining of the war, as will hereafter manifeſtly appear. The ſecond reaſon was wholly grounded on the prejudices of the privy-counſellors: for, ſuppoſing the negociation had been entered on, by what freſh evidence would this Prince have been able to demonſtrate, that the war was only defenſive on his part, ſince he had already alleged whatever could be ſaid on that ſubject, and ſince his papers were public? The third reaſon was of no greater force: for if the bare overture of a treaty was capable of keeping people in ſuſpenſe, and retarding the parliament's levies, it might alſo have the ſame effect with regard to thoſe of King Charles. But the counſellors ſuppoſed, his Majeſty's levies would be continued with vigor, while the parliament's preparations would be interrupted: that is to ſay, the parliament's adherents would fall into the ſnare, while care ſhould be taken privately to warn his Majeſty's friends to avoid it. Nothing more evidently manifeſts with what ſpirit they adviſed this Prince to ſend the parliament that meſſage.

Remarks on thoſe reaſons.

Howſoever all this was, the meſſage was ſent, the twenty-fifth of Auguſt (three days after ſeting up the ſtandard) (1) by the earl of Southampton, ſir John Culpepper, and ſome others.

Charles's meſſage to both houſes. Aug. 25. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 784. T. May. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 7.

He propounded to both houſes, "That ſome "perſons might be by them inabled, to treat with "the like number authoriſed by him, in ſuch a "a manner, and with ſuch freedom of debate, as "might beſt tend to the peace of the kingdom. "And he aſſured them, that nothing ſhould be "wanting on his part, which might advance the "Proteſtant religion, oppoſe Popery, ſecure the "laws of the land, and confirm all juſt power "and privileges of parliament. If this propoſi-"tion ſhould be rejected, he proteſted, he had "done his duty ſo amply, that God would abſolve "him from any of the guilt of that blood which "muſt be ſpilled."

His deputies ill received. p. 8.

As war was ſufficiently proclaimed by erecting the ſtandard, King Charles methinks ſhould have demanded a ſafe-conduct for his meſſengers. But tho' he had neglected to take this precaution, they pretended, on what grounds I know not, to go and ſit in their reſpective places, without any previous notice. The lords, offended at the earl of Southampton's boldneſs, called upon him to withdraw, and ordered him to ſend his meſſage in writing, and wait for an anſwer out of London. The commons alſo obliged Culpepper to deliver his meſſage at the bar; whereat his Majeſty was highly offended.

CHARLES I An' 1642.

The parliament's anſwer. Aug. 28. p. 9. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 785. T. May.

The anſwer of both houſes to his Majeſty's meſſage was, "That, notwithſtanding their indeavors "to prevent the diſtracted eſtate of the kingdom, "nothing had followed but proclamations and de-"clarations againſt both houſes of parliament, "whereby their actions were declared treaſonable, "and their perſons traitors. So that, until thoſe "proclamations were recalled, and the ſtandard "taken down, they could not, by the fundamen-"tal privileges of parliament, give his Majeſty "any other anſwer to his meſſages."

Vol. II. p. 9.

Charles's meſſengers being returned to Nottingham with this anſwer, "His Majeſty, ſays lord "Clarendon, was contented to make ſo much far-"ther uſe of their pride and paſſion, as to give "them occaſion, by another meſſage, to publiſh "more of it to the people." It is hence eaſy to judge, whether this Prince's real motive was a ſincere deſire of peace, ſince his meſſages were intended only to render the parliament odious. He ſaid in his reply: "That he never deſigned to declare "both houſes of parliament traitors, or ſet up his "ſtandard againſt them, and much leſs to put "them and the kingdom out of his protection; he "utterly profeſſed againſt it, before God and the "world. But he promiſed, that, if a day was "appointed by them, for the revoking their decla-"rations againſt all perſons as traitors, or other-"wiſe, for aſſiſting him, he would with all chear-"fulneſs, upon the ſame day, recal his procla-"mations and declarations, and take down his "ſtandard."

Charles's reply. Sept. 1. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 786. T. May.

In this meſſage, as in all his other papers, may be obſerved King Charles I's genius and character. He always made uſe of obſcure expreſſions, the interpretation whereof he reſerved to himſelf. It is true, he had not in expreſs terms declared both houſes traitors: but he called their members by that name, as the earl of Eſſex and others. So, according to his way of reaſoning, thoſe who executed the orders of both houſes were traitors and rebels, tho' the houſes themſelves were not ſo. It may be affirmed, that thoſe little artifices were what chiefly occaſioned this Prince's misfortunes, as they cauſed his forfeiting the truſt and confidence of his ſubjects. They inſpired the parliament with a perpetual jealouſy of being intangled by treaties, wherein it would have been impoſſible to avoid ſuch ambiguous expreſſions.

The anſwer of both houſes. Sept, 16. Ruſhworth, Vol. IV. p. 786. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 10.

The two houſes anſwered, "That his Majeſty "not having taken down his ſtandard, recalled his "proclamations and declarations, whereby he had "declared the actions of both houſes of parlia-"ment to be treaſonable, and their perſons trai-"tors, and having publiſhed the ſame ſince his "meſſage of the twenty-fifth of Auguſt, they "could not recede from their former anſwer. That "if his Majeſty would recal his declarations, and "return to his parliament, he ſhould find ſuch ex-"preſſions of their fidelities and duties, that his "ſafety, honor and greatneſs could only be found "in the affections of his people, and the ſincere "counſels of his parliament, who deſerved better "of his Majeſty, and could never allow them-"ſelves, repreſenting likewiſe the whole kingdom, "to be balanced with thoſe who gave evil counſels "to his Majeſty."

(1) This ſuppoſes the ſtandard was ſet up the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, as indeed Whitelock and Ruſhworth both affirm: tho' our author, after lord Clarendon, has it the twenty-fifth.

CHARLES I An' 1642.

Mean while both houſes, perceiving that Charles's aim, was to keep the people in ſuſpenſe by an uncertain expectation of peace, publiſhed a declaration; proteſting, they would never lay down their arms 'till his Majeſty had left delinquents to the juſtice of the parliament.

p. 11. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 2.

Charles's third meſſage. Sept. 11. Ibid. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 10.

Charles on his part, agreeably to his purpoſe, neglected not making uſe of both houſes anſwers to his two meſſages, in a third which he ſent them, ſaying, "Let all the world judge who had "uſed moſt indeavors to prevent the preſent di-"ſtractions, either he, who had condeſcended to "deſire and preſs it, or the two houſes, who had "refuſed to enter into a negociation. That, for "the future, if they deſired a treaty of him, he "ſhould remember, that the blood which was to "ſpilled in this quarrel was that of his ſubjects, "and therefore would return to his parliament, as "ſoon as the cauſes which had made him abſent "himſelf from it ſhould be removed."

Both houſes, finding his Majeſty's drift was to blacken in the public's eyes their refuſal to treat, made to this a ſtronger and more particular anſwer than they had to the two preceding meſſages: the ſubſtance of which anſwer here follows:

The parliament's reply. Sept. 16. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 3.

"That, at the very time his Majeſty propounded "a treaty, his ſoldiers were commiting numberleſs "oppreſſions and rapines.

"That they could not think his Majeſty had "done all that in him lay to remove the preſent "diſtractions, as long as he would admit of no "peace, without ſecuring the authors and inſtru-"ments of theſe miſchiefs from juſtice.

"That they beſought his Majeſty to conſider his "expreſſions, 'That God ſhould deal with him and "his poſterity, as he deſired the preſervation of "the juſt rights of parliament.' That never-"theleſs, his intention was to deny the parlia-"ment the privilege of declaring to be delinquents "thoſe they deemed ſuch, a privilege which be-"longed to the meaneſt court of juſtice in the king-"dom.

"That his Majeſty hath no cauſe to complain, "that he was denied a treaty, when they offered "whatſoever a treaty could produce, ſecurity, ho-"nor, ſervice, obedience, ſupport; and ſought "nothing but that their religion and liberty might "be ſcreened from the open violence of a wicked "party.

"That if there was any cauſe of treaty, 'they "knew no competent perſon to treat betwixt the "King and the parliament.'.

"That beſide, the ſeaſon was altogether unfit, "while his Majeſty's ſtandard was up, and "his proclamations and declarations, whereby his "parliament was charged with treaſon, unre-"called.

"That indeed his Majeſty had often proteſted "his tenderneſs of the miſeries of Ireland, and his "reſolution to maintain the Proteſtant religion, "and the laws of this kingdom. But that theſe "proteſtations could give no ſatisfaction to reaſon-"able and indifferent men, when at the ſame "time ſeveral of the Iriſh rebels, the known fa-"vorers of, and agents for them, were admited "to his Majeſty's preſenſe with grace and favor, "nay, ſome of them imployed in his ſervice: "when the cloaths, munition, horſe, bought by "his parliament for the ſupply of the Iriſh war, "were violently taken away, and applied to the "maintenance of an unnatural war againſt his "people.

"That if his Majeſty would be pleaſed to "come back to his parliament, they ſhould be "ready to ſecure his royal perſon, crown and dig-"nity, with their lives and fortunes."

CHARLES I An' 1642.

King Charles left not this anſwer without a reply: but inſtead of doing it by way of meſſage, he publiſhed a declaration to this effect:

The King's declaration. Sept. 27. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 5.

"Firſt, he alleged the laws in his favor.

"He denied that his ſoldiers had commited "any diſorders or violences, and affirmed, he had "never ſuffered them to oppreſs any perſon what-"ſoever.

"He recriminated upon the parliament. He "denied there were any Iriſh about him, and "maintained, that it was a notorious calumny, "like that caſt upon him heretofore by mr. Pym.

"He ſaid, the artillery-horſes he had taken at "Cheſter were few in number, and of ſmall value. "And for the cloaths, if his ſoldiers had taken "any which were deſigned for the ſervice of Ire-"land, it was done without his order; and tho' "he might have ſeized three thouſand ſuits which "were going thither, yet he refuſed to do it, and "gave order for their ſpeedy tranſportation.

"That the parliament made no ſcruple to imploy "in the war againſt their King, a hundred thou-"ſand pounds particularly appointed for the relief "of Ireland.

"That, of near five hundred members, of "which the lower-houſe conſiſted, there remained "not above three hundred, the reſt having been "driven away by tumults and threats, or with-"drawn themſelves, out of conſcience, from their "deſperate conſultations. That of above a hun-"dred peers, there remained but fifteen or ſixteen "in the upper-houſe.

"That it was not the body of the parliament, "but only thoſe violent leading members who "were authors of the war."

I omit ſundry general aſſertions, which might then be neceſſary to the King's deſigns, but which have been already intimated in the preceding papers.

The earl of Eſſex heads the parliament's army. p. 16. Charles marches from Notingham towards Wales. Sept. 16. p. 20. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 12.

During theſe paper-ſkirmiſhes, both ſides prepared for war. The earl of Eſſex, having ordered his forces to aſſemble at Northampton, departed London, the ninth of September, to head the army; and having reviewed them, found about ſixteen thouſand men, well armed and appointed, with a good train of artillery. Then his Majeſty, finding he could not any longer remain at Notingham with ſafety, marched towards the borders of Wales, with his troops (1), which were yet ſo few in number, that they merited not the name of an army. He was undetermined in what place to expect the forces which were to come to him from diverſe quarters; but deſigned, if poſſible, to ſecure Shrewſbury or Cheſter, without however knowing whether either of theſe towns would receive him; the parliament having in all thoſe parts very active and vigilant agents, who ſpared no labor to procure them adherents. For this reaſon the King advanced but very deliberately. When he came to Wellington, about ſeven miles from Shrewſbury (2), he drew together his little army, and cauſed to be read his orders for military diſcipline: which done, he took occaſion to harangue his ſoldiers; and the better to ſatisfy them of his good intentions to the public, he made the following proteſtation.

The King's proteſtation at the head of his army. Sept. 19. p. 13. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 21.

"I do promiſe, in the preſenſe of Al-"mighty God, and as I hope for his bleſſing and "protection, " protection, that I will, to the utmoſt of my " power, defend and maintain the true reformed " Proteſtant religion eſtabliſhed in the church of " England, and, by the grace of God, in the ſame " will live and die.

" I deſire to govern by all the known laws of " this land, and that the liberty and property of " the ſubject may be by them preſerved, with the " ſame care as my own rights. And if it pleaſe " God, by a bleſſing upon this army, raiſed for " my neceſſary defenſe, to preſerve me from this " rebellion, I do ſolemnly and faithfully promiſe, " in the ſight of God, to maintain the juſt privi- " leges and freedom of parliaments, and to govern " by the known laws of the land, to my utmoſt " power, and particularly to obſerve inviolably the " laws conſented to by me this parliament.

" In the mean while, if this time of war, and " the great neceſſity and ſtraits I am now driven " to, beget any violation of thoſe, I hope it ſhall " be imputed, by God and man, to the authors " of this war, and not to me, who have ſo earneſtly " labored for the preſervation of the peace of this " kingdom.

" When I willingly fail in theſe particulars, I " will expect no aid or relief from any man, or " protection from heaven: but, in this reſolution, " I hope for the chearful aſſiſtance of all good " men, and am confident of God's bleſſing.

King Charles was not contented with making this proteſtation to his army, but moreover, in all the conſiderable places thro' which he paſſed, he aſſembled the inhabitants, and indeavored to convince them of the ſincerity of his intentions. Theſe were neceſſary precautions, at a time when the chief point was to gain the people to his intereſt; for on the people depended both parties ſtrength.

He is received at Shrewſbury. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 12.

From Wellington his Majeſty marched to Shrewſbury, having received the agreeable news, that the town had declared in his favor, and the inhabitants would give him a joyful reception. Here he reſolved to fix his head quarters, and appoint the rendezvous of his army. This was a very convenient place to expect the troops which were levying for him in Wales, Yorkſhire and Lancaſhire, and to ſend for his ordnance, which had not been able to follow him to Notingham for want of horſes.

He ſeizes ſome horſes deſigned for Ireland; p. 27. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 13.

This want had conſtrained him to make uſe of a hundred draught horſes, ſent by the parliament to Cheſter, to be tranſported into Ireland. He deſired to have the conſent of the earl of Leiceſter, who was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and was then with him at Notingham: but his ſaid lordſhip conſtantly refuſing to give any orders about theſe horſes, bought with the parliament's money, Charles gained one Errington, a ſervant of the earl's, who took them in his maſter's name, and delivered them to the King(1). With this fact the parliament, as has been obſerved, taxed his Majeſty. As for arms, the King (not having a ſufficient quantity for all thoſe troops which were to come from diverſe parts) had diſarmed the militia in all the places thro' which he paſſed: but it was by way of loan, i. e. he obtained the militia officers conſent to take away their mens arms, on promiſe of reſtoring them. On Charles's arrival at Shrewſbury, the number of his troops ſo conſiderably increaſed that, in a few days, he had an army of ten thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, with which he was intirely ſecured from the danger he was in while his army was forming.

and borrows the militia arms. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 31. T. May.

He forms an army fourteen thouſand ſtrong. Sept. 20. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 36.

It is ſomewhat unaccountable, that the earl of Eſſex ſhould neither moleſt his Majeſty while at Notingham, nor in his march to Shrewſbury. In all probability, if, immediately on his arrival at Northampton, he had marched directly againſt the King, he would have ſtrangely imbraſſed and perhaps diſabled him from aſſembling a body of forces. This neglect can be aſcribed only to his not having power to act directly againſt the King's perſon, 'till he received his inſtructions, which he hourly expected, and which came too late. Both houſes, it ſeems, could not believe King Charles would be able to be ready ſo ſoon as he was, and imagined, that his inability to raiſe men and money muſt force him to ſome corner of the kingdom, or oblige him to throw himſelf into their arms: at leaſt, this is what they ſtrove to infuſe into the people, for fear of terrifying them with the notion of a war, the event whereof might be dubious. Charles made advantage of this error, to aſſemble all his forces at Shrewſbury, and provide himſelf with money, which he greatly wanted. His friends at London had taken care of this laſt article, and privately ſent conſiderable ſums to Oxford. Moreover, that univerſity, which had always been firmly attached to his Majeſty, had ingaged to deliver to him all the plate belonging to their colleges, which was very conſiderable. The point was only how to convey this aid to him ſafely. To that end, Charles ſent thither ſir John Byron, with a ſmall detachment of cavalry; not daring to give him a ſtronger, leſt it ſhould raiſe a ſuſpicion that it was for ſome affair of importance. Byron, coming to Oxford, received the money and plate, and returned towards Shrewſbury, by way of Worceſter, taking all poſſible precautions not to be intercepted in his march; this aid of money being to his Majeſty of the utmoſt conſequence, ſince without it he could not any how ſubſiſt. Wherefore, the better to ſecure it, he detached a band of cavalry, under command of Prince Rupert, who marched on the other ſide of the Severn to Worceſter to expect Byron, and guard him to Shrewſbury.

Mean while the earl of Eſſex, after ſtaying ſome days at Northampton, and ſecuring Warwick, determined on fixing his head-quarters at Worceſter. To that purpoſe, he diſpatched away before colonel Nathaniel Fiennes, who came to Worceſter at day-break, ſome hours after ſir John Byron was entered with his convoy. Fiennes, at his arrival being told, that ſome of the King's horſe were in the town, the number whereof he knew not, haſtily retreated, without making any attempt. Preſently after Prince Rupert arrived, and to ſecure the convoy brought by Byron, who was reſting himſelf in order to march on, paſſed thro' the town, and poſted himſelf with his cavalry at ſome diſtance on the other ſide. As he believed not any enemies were thereabouts, he was not very careful to hinder many of his troopers from ſtaying in the town. Being come to the place he had choſen, he alighted with his brother Prince Maurice, and moſt of the officers, repoſing themſelves on the ground. On a ſudden they perceived, within muſket-ſhot, five hundred of the enemy's horſe marching up a narrow lane. Theſe were a body commanded by colonel Sandys, whom the earl of Eſſex had ſent before to take poſſeſſion of Worceſter. Prince Rupert inſtantly mounting, without a moment's heſitation, charged theſe troops, as they came out of the lane, and the charge was ſo vigorous, that the enemy was intirely routed, and Sandys, with thirty of his followers, killed. the Prince a great name, not only for the valor he ſhewed, but chiefly for his ſudden and moſt ſeaſonable reſolution, in falling on thoſe enemies on their coming out of the lane, and when they leaſt expected it. Some hiſtorians, in relating this ſkirmiſh, ſeem to repreſent Prince Rupert as one of thoſe romantic heroes who, with five or ſix aſſiſtants, attacked and routed whole armies. But, after all, there is nothing wonderful in this feat of his, who had not poſted himſelf beyond Worceſter, without having with him his detachment: beſide, it is not ſaid, what was the number of the body he commanded. Nevertheleſs, this action, how inconſiderable ſoever it was, failed not to ſtrike great terror into the parliament's troops, chiefly by reaſon of the activity and courage of Prince Rupert, who afterwards gave them cauſe to be confirmed in their high opinion of his bravery, he being in reality one of the gallanteſt Princes in Europe. But tho' he had gained ſome little advantage, he thought not proper to expect the enemy at Worceſter. He marched ſome hours after, and ſafely conducted the convoy to Shrewſbury, where Charles inſtantly ordered the bullion to be coined. Next day, the earl of Eſſex poſſeſſed himſelf of Worceſter, and while he ſtayed there, ſecured Hereford, Gloceſter and Briſtol.

Eſſex takes ſeveral places. Whitelock.

It would doubtleſs be very ſtrange that in the twenty days of King Charles's continuance at Shrewſbury, his army ſhould ſo greatly increaſe, if, as ſome ſay, it was the effect of the parliament's refuſal to treat with him; ſo ſhort a ſpace of time not ſeeming ſufficient to determine people to repair to the places where they were liſted, and to conduct theſe new-raiſed troops to Shrewſbury. It may at leaſt be affirmed, that it is much leſs ſurpriſing, that his Majeſty's new levies, who could not be ready while he was at Notingham, or who cared not for marching to a place ſo expoſed, ſhould be in condition to march during his ſtay at Shrewſbury, tho' it was of twenty days only, ſince he had iſſued his commiſſions before he quited York.

The King marches towards London. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 33. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 30.

Howſoever this be, King Charles, finding himſelf at the head of an army little inferior in number to the earl of Eſſex's, and perceiving it ſufficed not to remain in quiet at Shrewſbury, while the enemy was uninterruptedly taking the principal towns in the heart of England, was of opinion it behoved him to indeavor bringing the war to a ſpeedy concluſion. To effect this the methods were two: one was to fight the enemy; the other to gain ſome marches upon them, and appear in ſight of London, before they could arrive. His Majeſty took this courſe, in the expectation that he ſhould raiſe in that capital a general conſternation, which might afford his friends opportunity to ſerve him effectually. So, ſuddenly begining to march, the twelfth of October, with his army, which was not much incumbered with baggage, there being not one tent, and few artillery; he quartered that night at Bridgenorth, ten miles from Shrewſbury, on the morrow he came to Wolverhampton, the third day to Birmingham, and the fourth to Kenelworth, where he reſted one day. It was two days before the earl of Eſſex had notice of his march, when he began to follow him. By his Majeſty's route, it evidently appears that, if he was not in queſt of the enemies, at leaſt he feared them not, ſince he could not be ignorant how eaſy it was for Eſſex, either to put himſelf in his way, or overtake him. To all appearance, he imagined the earl would be conſiderably retarded. Howſoever it be, it was not 'till the twenty-ſecond of October that the two armies came within ſix miles of each other, without having received any notice of each other's motions, 'till that day, which ſeems ſomewhat unaccountable. But what is ſtill more ſurpriſing, is, that the King, to whom ſpeed was ſo neceſſary, had ſo little advanced in five days; ſince leaving Kenelworth the ſeventeenth, he was, on the twenty-ſecond, but four miles north of Banbury; and that Eſſex, who departed the fifteenth from Worceſter, ſhould be only at Keinton the twenty-ſecond, which is not above twenty miles. His Majeſty, who 'till then knew not where the earl of Eſſex was, lay incamped near a village named Edgcot, where he had intelligence the twenty-ſecond at night, that the enemy was at Keinton, about ſix miles diſtant. He then found it would be very difficult to execute his deſign upon London, while he ſhould be ſo cloſely followed by enemies; and therefore he reſolved to give them battle. To that end, he drew up his army on Edge-hill, whence might be ſeen all Keinton plain, where the parliament's army ſtood in battle array, the twenty-third very early: but the ingagement began not 'till three in the afternoon. It is not known what induced King Charles to defer ſo long (1): but for the earl of Eſſex, he had a very ſtrong reaſon not to be in haſte; for, not imagining himſelf ſo near a battle, he had left behind two thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, with his artillery, and conſequently, delay could not but be advantageous to that general.

Charles I An' 1642.

Ibid. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 36.

Prince Rupert, who commanded the King's right wing of horſe, marching down the hill, and advancing to charge the enemies left wing, on a ſudden, ſir Faithful Forteſcue, who commanded a troop of the parliament's horſe, moving forwards with his whole troop from the groſs of the cavalry, and joining Prince Rupert, with his Highneſs charged thoſe he had deſerted. This unexpected occurrence inſpired the parliament's cavalry with ſuch terror, each man deeming his companion as his enemy, that they were utterly routed, and purſued more than two miles from the field of battle. By this unadviſed purſuit, his Majeſty was in danger of the ſame fate which his predeceſſor Henry III met with at the battle of Lewes. The parliament's right wing ſtood their ground no better than the left. They ran away full ſpeed, and were purſued with like fury and imprudence. What was moreover fatal to the King, was, that his reſerve of a regiment of horſe, judging the victory indiſputable, by the flight of the enemies cavalry, with ſpurs and looſe reins followed the chace, and were not to be ſtayed by their commanders.

Edge-hill fight. Octob. 23. P. 33, &c. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 34, &c. T. May. Ludlow. Manley.

All this while, the infantry of both armies were ingaged, without fortune's inclining to either ſide. But, finally, ſir William Balfour, to whom the earl of Eſſex had given command of his reſerve, turned the ſcale. Immediately on his beholding his Majeſty's cavalry buſied in purſuing the fugitives, he advanced to charge his infantry in flank, and put them into ſuch diſorder, that Charles, with the two Princes his ſons, were in danger of being made priſoners. Lindſey, the King's general was taken, having been ſhot in the thigh, of which wound he next day died, and the royal ſtandard, which was always near the King's perſon, was loſt by the death of its bearer; but it was afterwards, I know not how, recovered.

The return of Prince Rupert with his cavalry, prevented King Charles's utter defeat. For Balfour, who had only a ſmall body of reſerve, ſeeing thoſe

(1) Lord Clarendon (Vol. II. p. 35) ſays, tho' the horſe were ready, the foot were quartered at ſuch a diſtance, that many regiments marched ſeven or eight miles to the rendezvous, ſo that it was one o'clock before the King's forces moved.

horſe coming back from the chaſe, ſuddenly quited the fight, and ſecured himſelf near Eſſex's infantry. Could the King and Prince Rupert have perſuaded their cavalry to charge the parliament's foot, who had ſcarce any horſe to ſupport them, they had very probably routed them, and gained a complete victory. But the cavalry, being returned from the purſuit in extreme diſorder, could never be brought to fall upon their adverſaries, who ſtood in good order, tho' they were in great danger. As ſoon as the earl of Eſſex ſaw the enemy's horſe approaching, he drew off his foot from the battle, and ranged them in the beſt manner he could, in order the better to ſupport the charge of the King's cavalry, who, in all appearance, would attack them: but it was not his buſineſs to renew the fight. It was ſufficient for him to keep his ground, as he did 'till night, which freed him from his uneaſineſs.

When the battle commenced, ſcarce two or three hours day-light remained, and as the King's horſe had imployed ſome time in the purſuit, and, after their return, could not be prevailed on to re-ingage, it was too late for Charles to rally his infantry, who were in great diſorder, and whereof more than two thirds were miſſing. Both armies held their ſtations all night, and in the morning neither thought themſelves in condition to recommence hoſtilities. True, the forces left behind by the earl of Eſſex, came up in the night with his artillery. However, as he had no other cavalry than thoſe five hundred, which newly arrived, and the ſmall band commanded by Balfour, he did not think he ought to hazard a ſecond battle againſt a body of cavalry who had been victorious the day before, and were ſtill facing his army. King Charles, on his ſide, finding himſelf without infantry, and conſidering that his troops had greatly ſuffered by the cold, which was extremely ſharp that night, believed it ſufficient to let his enemies ſee he feared them not. In this diſpoſition, the two armies faced each other the whole day, without any deſire to ingage. At length, the earl of Eſſex ordering his baggage to be drawn off, his Majeſty retired to thoſe quarters he had taken the day before the battle, and Eſſex marched towards Warwick. The number of ſlain on the field of battle was about five thouſand. But what lord Clarendon ſays, that, two days after, the King reviewing his army, found there were not above three hundred men loſt, is ſcarcely credible, even according to his own deſcription of this ingagement. Without however dweling on the particular circumſtances of this battle, which were greatly diſguiſed or exagerated by both parties, who equally claimed victory, the conſequences demonſtrate, that they might have more juſtly owned each to have been worſted (1). Charles departed Shrewſbury, with deſign to attempt London; but after the battle he relinquiſhed that thought, tho' the road to London was open, and believed it properer he ſhould withdraw to Oxford. On the other hand, Eſſex followed his Majeſty, to obſtruct his going to London, but after the battle left him the road open, and, retiring to Warwick, put it out of his power to prevent or ſtop him. This I believe ſuffices to ſhew, it was a drawn battle, which afforded no real matter of triumph either to King or parliament. Indeed, three or four days after the battle, Charles took Banbury-caſtle, where was a gariſon of eight hundred foot and a troop of horſe. But if the circumſtances of reducing this place be well conſidered, it will be found far from being a conſequence or effect of victory. For firſt; his Majeſty ſummoned the caſtle, contrary to the opinion of all his generals, who believed his army little able to undertake the ſiege: ſecondly; he alleged for reaſon, that he could not determine what courſe to take, 'till he was informed of the enemies intention, and that, if they deſigned to attack him, he could not fight in a more advantageous ſtation. Hence may be infered, that he was not himſelf fully ſatisfied of the reality of his victory, ſince he preſumed the earl of Eſſex in condition to attack him. In ſhort, Banbury-caſtle ſurrendered at the firſt ſhot, which leaves it uncertain, whether Charles would have perſiſted in the ſiege in caſe of reſiſtance, and whether the earl of Eſſex would have ſuffered him to do it unmoleſted. The reduction of Banbury determined his Majeſty to withdraw to Oxford, the only place in thoſe parts at his devotion, by means of the univerſity, whoſe members were very zealouſly attached to his intereſt.

Tho' the parliament challenged alſo the victory, they were extremely ſenſible they had no great reaſon to triumph. They were however obliged to make a parade of this pretended victory, as if it had been real, to contradict Charles's friends, who were trying to ſtrike terror into the Londoners, and induce them to ſue for peace, on account of this pretended ſucceſs of his Majeſty's arms. Charles had yet many partiſans in the city, there not having hitherto been any meaſures taken to drive them away: nay, even in the parliament not a few continued there purpoſely to do the King ſervice, when occaſion ſhould offer, and who failed not improving the preſent opportunity. The news concerning the battle of Edge-Hill, or Keinton, being very various at firſt, King Charles's London-friends induſtriouſly magnified all the circumſtances which might give room to believe that his Majeſty was victorious, in order to diſpoſe the people to peace: for it muſt be obſerved that, ſince the breach, that Prince's grand aim had ever been to dazzle the public with the ſpecious term of peace, and he had never ceaſed hoping that the nation would compel the parliament to an agreement, by leaving him in poſſeſſion of all his prerogatives. This was his favorite project, from which he never ſwerved, not even when his affairs were moſt proſperous. It will hereafter, on ſundry occaſions, appear with what conſtancy he indeavored to execute this ſcheme. This preſent occaſion was the firſt ſince the war commenced. When both houſes had perfect information of the ſucceſs of the late ingagement, whatſoever public ſigns of rejoicing they gave, to make people believe their army victorious, they were very ſenſible ſuch victories were little capable to oblige the King to throw himſelf into their arms, tho'

On the parliament's ſide, fell lord St. John of Bletzo, and colonel Charles Eſſex. Lord Willoughby was taken priſoner, in indeavoring to reſcue his father, the earl of Lindſey. Upon the news of this battle (ſays Whitelock, p. 64.) all counties were alarmed and frighted, being a ſtrange thing in England. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 40, 41. T. May. Some ſay, there were but a thouſand killed. See Manley, p. 48, &c.——With relation to this battle, Denzil lord Hollis (Mem. p. 17.) tells a remarkable ſtory, from his own knowledge, concerning the famous Oliver Cromwell; and ſhews (as he obſerves) "he was as errant a coward, as he was notoriouſly perfidious, ambitious, "and hypocritical. This was his baſe keeping out of the field at Keinton battle; where he, with his troop of horſe "came not in, impudently and ridiculouſly affirming, the day after, that he had been all that day ſeeking the army and "place of fight, tho' his quarters were but at a village near hand, whence he could not find his way, nor be directed by "his ear, when the ordnance was heard twenty or thirty miles off."

the public had been amuſed with ſuch hopes. Then ſuch of Charles's partiſans as were ſtill in the houſe of commons, obſerving the conſternation expreſſed by moſt of the members, became bolder, and ſcrupled not propoſing a peace, as the only means to free them from their imbaraſs. Very ſeemingly, this was done with the conſent of his Majeſty, who at the ſame time was uſing his utmoſt indeavors to perſuade the public, that he had obtained at Edge-hill a compleat victory.

A day before this battle, both houſes had publiſhed a declaration, whereof I ſhall content myſelf with relating the ſubſtance: ſince having inſerted ſo many of theſe papers, I am apprehenſive my readers would be tired, were all we may have occaſion to mention, to be inſerted at full length.

The parliament's declaration before the battle. October 22. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 26.

The two houſes proteſted firſt; "That no "private paſſion or reſpect, no evil intention "to his Majeſty's perſon, no deſign to the pre"judice of his juſt honor and authority, ingaged "them to raiſe forces, and have recourſe to "arms.

"That his Majeſty had refuſed to receive a very "humble and dutiful petition, which they had "directed the earl of Eſſex to deliver.

"That they were fully convinced the King was "ſo ingaged to the Popiſh party, that all hopes "of peace were excluded.

"That great numbers of Papiſts had in ſhew "conformed to the Proteſtant religion, in order "to qualify themſelves for poſts in the King's "army.

"That his Majeſty indeavored at firſt to keep "off all jealouſies and ſuſpicions, by many fearful "oaths and imprecations, concerning his purpoſe "of maintaining the Proteſtant religion, and the "national laws, cauſing ſome profeſſed Papiſts to "be diſcharged from his army, and none to be "received who would not come to church, receive "the ſacrament, and take the oaths: but that "afterwards his confidence in the prieſts did more "clearly appear; prieſts and Jeſuits, impriſoned "for being ſuch, having been releaſed out of "Lancaſter jail, and commiſſions granted to pro"feſſed Papiſts.

Here fourteen of them were named.

"That lord Herbert, the earl of Worceſter's "ſon, a notorious Papiſt, was made general of the "King's troops in all South-Wales.

"That thoſe who raiſed forces for his Ma"jeſty, in the North of England, did arm and im"ploy Papiſts.

"That men had been ſent to Hamburgh and "Denmark to levy forces there, and to bring them "over to join with the earl of Newcaſtle, and the "army of Papiſts which was intended to be raiſed "in Newcaſtle.

"That the King had received in his court ſeveral "Papiſts from Ireland; of whom ſome were in"dicted of high-treaſon for their rebellion there; "viz. lord Taffe, &c.

"That diverſe Engliſh traitors were the chief "counſellors, and actors in this unnatural war, as "lord Digby, O-Neal, Wilmot, Pollard, Aſh"burnham, &c.

"That diverſe Jeſuits and prieſts, in foreign "parts, made great collections of money for the "relief of the Papiſts in Ireland, and the farther"ing of his Majeſty's deſigns againſt the parlia"ment.

"For all which reaſons they were reſolved to "enter into a ſolemn oath and covenant, and ex"pected that their brethren of Scotland would help "and aſſiſt them, according to the act of paci"fication between the two kingdoms."

CHARLES I. AN' 1642.

Charles anſwered this declaration with two others, which were publiſhed after the battle of Edge-hill. In the firſt he ſaid:

Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 29.

"That notwithſtanding the ſolemn proteſtation "of both houſes, of having no evil intention to "his perſon, yet they had uſed their utmoſt "power, by the ſtrength of their army, to have "deſtroyed him.

"That if he refuſed to give admitance to the "petition ſent by the earl of Eſſex, it was becauſe "it was ſent by perſons whom he had particularly "accuſed of high-treaſon." [Here he gave a long account of this whole affair.]

"He denies his ever having had any inclina"tion to the Papiſts, or that he had releaſed "any prieſts or Jeſuits out of Lancaſter jail.

"He affirmed, that the Papiſts, ſuppoſed to have "commiſſions, were not ſo much as known to "him, and that they had not, to his knowledge, "any command in his army.

"He expreſly denied, that he ever ſent to raiſe "forces in Hamburgh, or Denmark.

"He affirmed, the parliament entertained ſeveral "Papiſts in their troops, and of this he ſpake "knowingly, as having taken ſeveral of them "priſoners at the battle of Edge-hill (1)."

p. 39.

The ſecond declaration was intitled; "His "Majeſty's Declaration to all his loving Subjects, "after his late Victory againſt the Rebels, on "Sunday the twenty-third of October, 1642." This title was prefixed on purpoſe to cheriſh the fears which Charles's friends were indeavoring to infuſe into the people, on account of the pretended victory lately obtained by his Majeſty againſt the parliament's army.

The intent of this declaration was to vindicate King Charles upon three main points; viz. 1. That his Majeſty favored Popery, and imployed Papiſts in his army. 2. That his deſign was to extirpate parliaments. 3. That it was his intention, by the commiſſion of array, to take from gentlemen part of their eſtates. I ſhall ſpeak here of the firſt only; becauſe, after what has been ſeen, it would be needleſs to repeat what the King alleged in his vindication upon the two laſt. As to the firſt therefore he ſaid:

The King's anſwer as to imploying Papiſts.

"That altho' he ſhould imploy Papiſts, no one "would wonder, who conſidered the hardſhips and "ſtreights he was driven to, and the little ſcruple "the parliament made to imploy Popiſh officers "and ſoldiers, who ſerved in great numbers in their "army; the induſtry they uſed to corrupt their "loyalty; the private promiſes wherewith they "allured them to their ſervice, even to the aſ"ſuring them, that all the penal laws ſhould be "repealed. That notwithſtanding the artifices "of his enemies, and the weakneſs of his own "condition, he could not prevail with himſelf "to recal his proclamation againſt receiving into "his army ſuch as had not taken the oaths. He "however owned that he had ſwerved from this "general rule, in favor of ſome of eminent abili"ties in command and conduct."

We ſhall find hereafter, that tho' this proclamation was not recalled, it was very far from being punctually obſerved.

Soon after, both houſes returned their anſwer to this declaration, the ſubſtance whereof was:

Reply of both houſes. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 41.

"That it was aſtoniſhing the King, having "affirmed ſo poſitively, that a far greater number "of Papiſts ſerved in their army than in his, he

" ſhould not have been pleaſed to name a ſingle " inſtance: that they ſhould have been glad of " knowing their names, as it would have afforded " means to remove thoſe of that religion who, " under the profeſſion of Proteſtants, might have " creeped into the army without their privity."

Then they pretended to ſhew, by ſeveral reaſons, the abſurdity of ſaying, that the parliament indeavored to corrupt the loyalty of the Papiſts, with the promiſe of repealing the penal laws, and alleged diverſe inſtances of their ſeverity againſt them, during the ſiting of this parliament.

But for a demonſtration (ſaid they) that the King acted not with ſincerity, when he alleged, in his vindication, that he had ordered no recuſant to be received into his troops, and that this order was a mere illuſion, they named ſeveral Popiſh officers, who had commiſſions under the King's own hand, which commiſſions then remained in the houſe of commons. Moreover, they annexed to this declaration a petition, preſented to Charles by the Popiſh inhabitants of Lancaſhire, deſiring leave to provide themſelves with arms for his ſervice; with his Majeſty's anſwer, granting their requeſt. This petition, and Charles's anſwer, ſeem to me ſo deciſive upon the preſent caſe, which was ſo often repeated, that I am of opinion they ought to be inſerted verbatim: viz.

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

It is proper to animadvert, with regard to theſe two papers, that the queſtion between Charles and both houſes was not, whether the King might or might not lawfully imploy Papiſts in his ſervice but, whether he did really imploy them: and therefore care muſt be taken, not to confound the right with the fact, the latter only being the point in queſtion. Now theſe two papers demonſtrate, that King Charles did actually imploy Papiſts in his ſervice, even at the begining of this war, and before any effuſion of blood: for this petition was preſented him while he was yet at Shreſbbury (1). Remark on this ſubject.

For a ſtronger conviction, both houſes annexed likewiſe to their declaration, a liſt of the names of twenty-eight officers, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains and lieutenants, who were Papiſts, and actually ſerving his Majeſty, in the earl of Newcaſtle's army. Ibid.

King Charles and the parliament were in this ſtate of animoſity, when his Majeſty's private friends in the houſe of commons moved to ſue for peace, under color of the parliament's inability to continue the war, after their late foil at Edge-hill. and to incourage his well-wiſhers in London to join with thoſe in the parliament, ſent offers of pardon to the cities of London and Weſtminſter; thereby inſinuating to the inhabitants, that ſuch an offer could not but proceed from the ſuperiority he had acquired by his victory. He practiſed the like with regard to ſome other towns. Certain it is, London was then in a great agitation, cauſed by Charles's friends, who, under pretenſe of dreading a war which, according to them, was ſo unfortunately begun, imployed their utmoſt indeavors to induce the people openly to demand peace. Againſt theſe ſecret practiſes it concerned the leading men in the parliament to provide: and as their abilities were no way inferior to thoſe of their adverſaries, they ſoon found means to baffle this project. Inſtead of oppoſing the motion to ſue the King for peace, they ſupported it ſtrenuouſly. They ſaid, "That "the parliament had not taken arms for the ſake "of going to war, but only to procure a good "peace, the moſt deſirable thing in the world: "that both houſes ought not to be aſhamed to "make the firſt advances, and humbly ſue for "peace to their Sovereign; but withal, care was "to be taken, that a too great zeal for peace "might not be a means to leave them at the "mercy of their enemies: that, in order to make "ſuch a peace as was neceſſary to the welfare of "the kingdom, the King was to be told, that "they were not yet reduced to the point of being "forced to accept of ſuch terms as he ſhould "pleaſe to impoſe; and therefore, if they would "have a peace wherein every man might find his "ſafety, it was neceſſary to take good meaſures "for the continuance of the war: that, among "all the means which could be uſed, they ſaw "none more proper, than to invite their brethren "of Scotland to their aſſiſtance, purſuant to the "treaty between the two nations. Not that they "actually wanted them, the parliament's affairs "not being reduced to ſuch extremities, that "foreigners were to be haſtily introduced into the "kingdom, but that the Scots would doubtleſs ſo "anſwer their requeſt, as to convince the King, "that this refuge would not fail the two houſes in "caſe of need: that thereby they ſhould become "more formidable; and if the King was really "deſirous of a peace, he would be forced to grant "it upon reaſonable terms, which was all ought "to be expected."

Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 47.

Meaſures of the King's opponents.

As this advice was very plauſible, and moreover propoſed by men in whom the majority had great confidence, it was approved by the houſe. Indeed, none could be ignorant that, by the peace which Charles had hitherto offered, and which his friends moved to ſue for, could be underſtood only a peace which ſhould put him in poſſeſſion of all his prerogatives, and that his word ſhould be taken for ſecurity that he would not again abuſe them. But tho' the members of parliament doubted not that his Majeſty would grant an act of oblivion, ſuch as they ſhould deſire, they believed not that ſuch a peace could be advantageous to the kingdom, becauſe they did not believe the King's word to be a ſufficient ſecurity. Beſide, the Preſbyterians were no better pleaſed, than they had been hitherto, with a peace which would of courſe reſtore epiſcopacy in all its preſtine luſter. Wherefore, matters not being yet brought to ſuch a criſis, that the parliament ſhould be induced to wiſh for ſuch a peace, it was reſolved, 1. That his Majeſty ſhould be addreſſed for ſetling the peace of the kingdom. 2. That the preparations of forces, and other neceſſary means for defenſe, ſhould be proſecuted with all vigor, if a ſafe and honorable peace might not be obtained. 3. That the Scots ſhould be applied to for aſſiſtance, if there ſhould be occaſion. Theſe reſolutions intirely diſconcerted all the meaſures of Charles's friends, who had flattered themſelves, that the pretended victory at Edge-hill would produce ſome great effect.

The parliament reſolve to demand aid of the Scots. Ibid, &c.

Charles I An' 1642.

Purſuant to theſe reſolutions, the parliament took care to recruit the earl of Eſſex's army, and to that end it was ordained, that ſuch apprentices as ſhould be liſted for ſoldiers, ſhould reckon the time imployed in the wars, as part of their apprenticeſhip: whereupon great numbers of apprentices ingaged in the parliament's ſervice.

A declaration, incouraging apprentices to liſt in the parliament's army. p. 48. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 53.

After that, both houſes ſent into Scotland a declaration, wherein they did not indeed demand immediate aid; but ſaid, "That they did not "doubt but the Scots would aſſiſt them, if there "ſhould be occaſion, according to the treaty of "amity and alliance between the two nations. "That therefore they deſired them to raiſe ſuch "forces, as they ſhould think ſufficient to ſecure "their own borders againſt attempts of the army "of Papiſts, levied by the earl of Newcaſtle in "the north of England." The readier to ingage them to what they deſired, they ſaid, "The ene-"mies of the Proteſtant religion were ſo preva-"lent with his Majeſty, that he had rejected all "the petitions preſented him: that the preſent "war was for the maintainance of religion, againſt "the efforts of thoſe who had projected its de-"ſtruction; and that, in order to preſerve it more "effectually, they had willingly imbraced the in-"vitation of the Scots to a nearer degree of "union, in matters of religion and church-govern-"ment, which they had accordingly reſolved to "purſue."

The parliament's declaration to the Scots. Novemb. 7. p. 393. Clarendon, ubi ſupra.

It was now ſome months ſince the Scotiſh commiſſioners, reſiding at London, had intimated, in a memorial preſented to the parliament, that the Scots paſſionately deſired a union of the churches of England and Scotland in the ſame worſhip and diſcipline. As this propoſition was expreſſed by way of wiſh only, and beſide was worded in ſuch manner that it might be underſtood either, that the Scots deſired the Engliſh to imbrace the worſhip and diſcipline of the church of Scotland, or that they themſelves were willing to conform to the church of England, the parliament had, in the like ambiguous terms, courteouſly replied; that they alſo wiſhed the ſame thing, and would heartily concur in the accompliſhing that project. This anſwer was undoubtedly framed by the leading Preſbyterians, to ſerve as a corner-ſtone, of which they hoped one day to make good uſe: but it was not yet time to declare their intentions more openly, for fear of loſing all ſuch church of England men as oppoſed his Majeſty. Probably theſe men would have been alarmed, had they clearly known, that the Preſbyterians deſigned to eſtabliſh their worſhip and diſcipline upon the church's ruins. For the ſame reaſon alſo, in the above-hinted declaration, both houſes, or rather the directors, thought not proper to ſpeak more plainly; and, in ſaying, that both houſes intended to purſue this union, the propoſition was left in all its ambiguity, tho' it was eaſy for the Scots to perceive, that in time they ſhould receive ſatisfaction: for it is not to be imagined, there were none but Preſbyterians in the parliament's party, tho' this may be the idea ſome would give us of that faction; their aim being to inſinuate, that the war between King Charles and his parliament was properly a religious war, and that the parliament's ſole deſign was to deſtroy the Church of England, and in its ſtead to eſtabliſh Preſbytery. As this deſign was unjuſt in itſelf, they would infer, that the war againſt his ſaid Majeſty was unjuſt. This reaſoning would be ſolid and convincing, were it true, that this Prince's opponents had propoſed to themſelves this this end only: but, as it is certain the Preſbyterians were not the only perſons who had cauſe to complain of King Charles, it is no leſs ſo, that his enemies faction conſiſted not of Preſbyterians alone, but alſo of a great number of church-men, who ſaw that, under color of cruſhing Puritaniſm, deſpotiſm was on the point of being eſtabliſhed. It is eaſy to conceive, that theſe men who were ill-affected to the King, had joined with the parliament, and as yet were attached to their party: but it is inconceivable that the Preſbyterians, who at the beginning of this parliament made ſo inconſiderable a figure in both houſes, as well as in the kingdom, ſhould be grown ſo very numerous in the ſpace of two years, or that the church of England members, who complained of Charles's former adminiſtration, ſhould have intirely renounced the Church, and imbraced Preſbytery. It is certain therefore, tho' the Preſbyterian faction, conſidered as a religious party, had prevailed in the parliament, there were however in that ſame party, conſidered as enemies to the King, many Church-men who had no other view than a reformation of the civil government, and ſecurity of the nation's liberties. Theſe were the men the parliament were to manage, for fear of alarming them, 'till they could be ingaged to become Preſbyterians, whether by the ſuperiority the parliament ſhould acquire in the courſe of this war, or by the abſolute neceſſity they ſhould be under of relinquiſhing the peoples liberties, or of recurring to the Scots for aſſiſtance, which could be obtained only by a change in eccleſiaſtical diſcipline. Contrariwiſe, the church of England men could not take it amiſs, that the parliament managed the Scots, ſince poſſibly their aid might be abſolutely neceſſary. The ambiguous expreſſions therefore in the declaration, with reſpect to the union of both churches, ſerved to manage all thoſe who were concerned for the parliament's affairs. The Scots were gladly ſuffered to fancy, that the propoſition was underſtood in the ſenſe they themſelves gave it, and thoſe of the church of England were told, That the parliament was properly bound to nothing, in promiſing to indeavor ſuch union, becauſe there was no more reaſon for the church of England to conform to that of Scotland, than for this latter's conforming to that of England: that however great advantage would accrue from this pretended ingagement, in that Charles, from the apprehenſion of ſeeing the parliament cloſely united with Scotland, would be induced to make peace upon reaſonable terms.

New projects of Charles's friends in London. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 54.

Tho', on this occaſion, King Charles's adverſaries had gained ſome advantage in the parliament, his friends thought not themſelves vanquiſhed. They plainly ſaw that, ſo long as both houſes ſhould be able to act with freedom, his Majeſty's opponents would always be ſuperior, and that it was ſcarcely poſſible to take away this freedom without ſome extraordinary aſſiſtance. Wherefore, while people were ſtill in the agitation occaſioned by Edge-hill fight, they notified to that Prince, that, if he would appear before London with his army, they queſtioned not there would be raiſed in the city ſuch commotions as would turn to his advantage, wherein his friends would not fail exerting themſelves to the utmoſt of their ability. This made him determine on marching to London. In order thereto, he diſpatched away before a body of cavalry, who advancing to Reading, the parliament's troops there quartered, were ſeized with ſuch a panic, that they intirely abandoned the place, and Charles ſoon after came thither with his army. Both houſes were alarmed when they underſtood his Majeſty to be within thirty miles of London: ſo, whether for that reaſon, or with deſign to amuſe him, they deſired a ſafe-conduct for a commitee of peers and commoners to attend him, with a petition for peace, purſuant to a reſolution taken ſome days before. Charles granted a ſafe-conduct for the commitee, excepting only Sir John Evelyn, becauſe he was proclaimed traitor. Mean while, both houſes had notice, that the Earl of Eſſex was, with all poſſible expedition, marching towards London. For this cauſe, they were in no haſte to ſend his Majeſty the commitee, on pretenſe of his ſcrupling to admit Evelyn. It is not eaſy to conceive why King Charles, who could not be ignorant that the execution of this project depended on his diligence, ſtayed long enough at Reading to give Eſſex time to reach London as ſoon as himſelf. Howſoever this be, he marched, the eleventh of November, to Colebrook, fifteen miles from London. The earl of Eſſex's army arrived about the ſame time, in the neighborhood of that metropolis: but, whether it was not ready ſoon enough, or the parliament was alarmed, the commitee was that very day diſpatched to his Majeſty, with a moſt humble petition, to appoint ſome place for a treaty. To this petition Charles gave a gracious anſwer, teſtifying he wiſhed for nothing more than a peace, and to that end was content to enter into treaty. The commitee returning to London with this anſwer, the parliament inſtantly diſpatched away orders to their forces, not to commit any hoſtilities. But preſently after the commitee's departure, King Charles began to march towards Brentford, which is only ſeven miles from London, and arriving there, the twelfth in the morning, attacked the town, where ſome of the parliament's troops were quartered, and became maſter of it, after ſome reſiſtance (1). Immediately after, he ſent a meſſage to both houſes, informing them that, ſince his anſwer to their petition laſt night, he had received advice, that the earl of Eſſex was drawing his forces out of London towards him, which had obliged him to march to Brentford: that however he was ſtill deſirous of peace, and expected their commitee at Brentford that night, or early next morning.

The King marches to Reading,

Eſſex's army was indeed arrived near London, the ſeventh, and that earl himſelf was actually in the houſe of peers the twelfth, during the aſſault of Brentford. Whereupon both houſes ordered the lord-mayor to ſend out the trained-bands, to join Eſſex's forces, who thereby became abundantly ſuperior to Charles's army (2). The parliament complained, that Charles had deceived them, under the falſe ſhew of deſiring to treat of a peace; ſince, immediately after the commitee had left him, he marched to ſurpriſe Brentford. That Prince would by two allegations have juſtified himſelf. He ſaid firſt, that not only there was no truce agreed on, but none even deſired. Secondly, that after the commitee's departure, he received certain intelligence of Eſſex's having ſent forces to Kingſton, Acton, and other places, to ſurround him, which had obliged him to advance to Brentford. The former of theſe reaſons was the beſt; for, there not being any ceſſation of arms, he might juſtly take all advantages he thought proper: but he inſiſted leaſt upon this; for, being diſappointed, he would not have it appear, that his deſign was to poſſeſs himſelf of London, or at leaſt to raiſe commotions there in his favor, for fear of expoſing his friends to a ſtrict inquiſition. The latter was not alike forcible; for if he was apprehenſive of being ſurrounded at Colebrook, he avoided not that inconvenience, by advancing eight miles nearer to London: he rather added to it by that march, except he advanced with deſign to attack the enemy; which did not appear by his conduct.

Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 57.

Charles is moreover furniſhed with another reaſon, not mentioned in a kind of manifeſto, publiſhed by himſelf on this occaſion. Prince Rupert, it is ſaid, had advanced to Hounſlow with the cavalry, without Charles's order, and when there, was informed, that the parliament had ſent forces to Kingſton, Acton, and other places: ſo, finding he was going to be ſurrounded, ſent to requeſt his Majeſty would advance with his infantry to diſingage him. This reaſon to me ſeems ſo very weak, that I ſhould think a refutation quite needleſs, had it not come from this noble writer of the hiſtory of thoſe times. I will not ſay, it does much redound to Prince Rupert's honor, to affirm he had advanced without the King's order with his cavalry, which likewiſe is not abundantly probable. But firſt, if his ſaid Highneſs fancied himſelf in danger, his retiring to the King was much eaſier to be effected, than the King's marching to his relief. Secondly; what probability was there, that the parliament's forces, ſuppoſed to have been detached to ſurround Prince Rupert, ſhould poſt themſelves between him and the King? Thirdly; Eſſex's army came near London but that very day, and was not in condition to march ten or twelve miles farther to attack Rupert.

Nothing is therefore more likely, than that Charles, when he departed Oxford, intended to ſurpriſe London, or hoped his friends would ſo manage that he ſhould be there received without oppoſition, before Eſſex could arrive: but he either loſt too much time at Reading, or was prevented by that earl's expeditious diligence. Nevertheleſs, ſince he was not ignorant that the parliament's forces were already very near London, one cannot well ſee what it ſignified to attack Brentford, except it was to brave the parliament, or, having firſt deſigned to give battle, he had altered his mind upon hearing that the London militia were ſent to join the earl of Eſſex. Be it ſo or otherwiſe, having miſſed his aim, he was obliged to frame reaſons to color his attacking Brentford, and, if poſſible, to perſuade the public it was done merely in his own defenſe. After all, it is very likely that, when he ſent back the commitee from Colebrook, he was determined on marching to Brentford, and was not ſorry the parliament amuſed themſelves with the hopes of a treaty: at leaſt, the reaſons he alleged in his vindication prove not the contrary.

Military actions in ſeveral places. Whitelock, p. 66.

Hoſtilities continued the whole winter in ſeveral parts of England, ſcarce a county being exempted. My deſign is not to particulariſe every ſkirmiſh and rencounter during this war. Such circumſtances may be agreeable to the Engliſh, who are acquainted with the places ſituation, or concerned for the honor of thoſe who ſignaliſed themſelves on thoſe occaſions. But foreigners, for whom I write, being little intereſted, I ſhall confine myſelf to a ſuccinct recital of ſome of the moſt notable actions.

In the North. Dec. 1. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 65.

Very early in December, the earl of Newcaſtle, who had levied a body of troops for his Majeſty in the northern counties, began his march towards York. He was ſtoped at the paſſage of the river Tees, which parts the palatinate of Durham from Yorkſhire, by young Hotham, who had with him a detachment of the little army, commanded by lord Fairfax, in that county, for the parliament: but Newcaſtle forced the paſſage, and marched to York, with about eight thouſand men.

CHARLES I An' 1642.

Likewiſe during this winter, in the ſame county, there were two pretty warm actions. The firſt at Tadcaſter, where lord Fairfax lay intrenched, and where he was attacked by the earl of Newcaſtle, who was finally, after a moſt obſtinate diſpute, obliged to retreat. The ſecond was at Giſborough, where ſir Hugh Cholmley defeated ſix hundred of royaliſts, commanded by colonel Slingſby, who was, with a good number of his followers, made priſoner.

A few days after, ſir Thomas Fairfax, the general's ſon, attacked the town of Leeds, defended by ſir William Savil with fifteen hundred men, carried it by ſtorm, and took five hundred priſoners. Theſe were the moſt remarkable actions in the North, during that winter which ſucceeded the firſt campain.

Leeds taken Jan. 23.

In the South, ſir William Waller, commander for the parliament, blew up Farnham-caſtle, and made the gariſon priſoners of war. He not long after this reduced Wincheſter, and then Chicheſter, which latter coſt him a ſiege of eight days.

Waller takes Farnham and Chicheſter. Dec. 29. p. 100.

In the mid-land counties alſo happened ſeveral notable incounters, tho' little deciſive. The fifth of December, Wilmot, commiſſary-general of the King's horſe, lord Digby, and others, attacked the town of Marlborough, fortified by the parliament, where was a numerous gariſon. The town, being entered by ſtorm, was plundered and burned, and about a thouſand of the gariſon killed and made priſoners.

February the ſecond, Prince Rupert carried Cirenceſter by ſtorm, and took priſoners twelve hundred.

Cirenceſter taken.

March the firſt, Lord Brooke attacked ſome royaliſts intrenched in the cloſe of Litchfield cathedral, and was there ſlain; but after his death his men carried that cloſe.

Litchfield taken. Lord Brooke's death.

Finally, on the nineteenth, a battle was fought at Salt-heath near Stafford, which was maintained four hours, 'till the earl of Northampton, who commanded Charles's troops, being ſlain, the parliamentarians got the victory.

The ſame day, ſir William Waller ſurpriſed lord Herbert, who was beſieging Glouceſter, killed five hundred of his men, and took upwards of a thouſand priſoners. After that, he took Chepſtow, in Monmouthſhire, and then reduced the town of Monmouth.

Waller defeats lord Herbert. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 63, 99, 97, 113, 114, 115, 118, 119.

I proceed now to what paſſed in the weſtern counties, from the firſt hoſtilities to March next year, 1643. As the war was always very ſharp in thoſe quarters, and as the ſuperiority was there obſtinately diſputed, it will be neceſſary, for the better underſtanding theſe events, to be ſomewhat circumſtantial in the tranſactions of thoſe counties.

From the time King Charles was at Beverley, after having failed in his attempt upon Hull, he diſpatched away weſtward the marquis of Hertford, to attempt raiſing there a party capable to give the parliament's forces a diverſion. He granted him a commiſſion to command all the weſtern parts, and his lordſhip nominated ſir Ralph Hopton his general of horſe. The marquis, being come into Somerſetſhire, fixed his quarters at Bath, where he could raiſe but few men, by reaſon of the vigilance of the militia commitee, who greatly obſtructed his levies. At length the earl of Bedford, who commanded in thoſe parts for the parliament, having having drawn together forces abundantly more numerous than thoſe who liſted for his Majeſty, Hertford was obliged to retire into Wales. He ſent however ſir Ralph Hopton with about a hundred and fifty horſe into Cornwal, to indeavor gaining that county to the King's intereſt. Bedford neglected purſuing this little troop, not doubting but the militia commitee would be able to diſperſe them, and marched away to join the earl of Eſſex. This paſſed before the battle of Edgehill.

Hopton was well received in Cornwal, and ſeconded by ſir Bevil Greenvil, a Corniſh gentleman, who ſo managed that the county declared for his Majeſty. Then Hopton aſſembled three thouſand of the trained-bands, and advanced towards Lanceſton, whence they chaſed the commitee of the militia, who had got together a few troops: but propoſing to lead theſe trained-bands into Devonſhire, they refuſed to march out of their county: for which reaſon he diſmiſſed them, having firſt driven the commitee from the little town of Saltaſh.

p. 100.

Mean while, with the aſſiſtance of the gentry of that county, he found means to levy fifteen hundred regular troops, with whom he became abſolute maſter of all Cornwal, and even made incurſions into Devonſhire.

p. 101.

The parliament, having notice of Hopton's progreſs in Cornwal, ordered all their forces in Dorſet and Somerſet to join with thoſe of Devon, and gave the command of this army to the earl of Stamford: who heading theſe troops, ſent Ruthen, a Scot, governor of Plymouth, with a detachment into Cornwal. He was no ſooner there, but was met by ſir Ralph Hopton, who put him to rout, killed many of his men, and took priſoners upwards of twelve hundred. Ruthen, on his defeat, retired to Saltaſh, where he indeavored to fortify himſelf, and the earl of Stamford withdrew to Taviſtock (1).

p. 102.

Hopton, taking advantage of the terror wherewith he had inſpired the parliamentarians, divided his forces into two bodies; with one of which he marched towards Ruthen, and beat him out of Saltaſh, and thereby rendered himſelf once more maſter of Cornwal. The other body moved towards Taviſtock, which Stamford likewiſe quiting, and retiring to Plymouth inabled Hopton the more eaſily to fix quarters in Devonſhire. But, very ſoon after, both parties having agreed to obſerve a perfect neutrality in the two counties of Devon and Cornwal, in order to remove the war into other parts, Hopton retired with his forces into Cornwal.

Civil affairs of the year 1642.

Having related the principal military actions of the firſt campain, and the inſuing winter, it will be requiſite we touch on ſome other matters, which indeed flowed from the war, but were not decided by the ſword.

Remarks on the levies of money on both ſides.

Money being the ſinews of war, it is no wonder both King and parliament ſhould do their utmoſt to raiſe all they could: but the wonder is, that they ſhould upbraid each other with the expedients made uſe of to that purpoſe. According to England's laws, the Sovereign cannot levy money upon the ſubject, without conſent of parliament; but it is no leſs certain, that parliaments cannot impoſe taxes without the royal aſſent. Taxes are laid by acts, to which the King and both houſes muſt neceſſarily give their approbation. But what is to be done when the King and parliament are at war with each other? Neither of them, according to the laws, muſt levy money upon the people, and then it will be almoſt impoſſible to carry on a war, or elſe both muſt be left at liberty to raiſe it, without regarding each other's conſent. This was what both King and parliament practiſed, and yet they reproached one another with breach of the laws. If we credit thoſe who have written in King Charles's favor, his ſaid Majeſty had no other money than what he was ſupplied with voluntarily, by gift or loan (2). If he ſometimes taxed thoſe counties which were in his power, it was always with the inhabitants concurrence. But this is a kind of artifice to deceive the reader: for it means nothing more, than that ſome of the leading men of a town or county were gained, by whom it was reſolved to give the King ſuch a ſum, after which it would have been in vain for the reſt to oppoſe it, or refuſe paying their quota. The parliament proceeded in much a like manner. They demanded for maintainance of the war contributions, which they termed voluntary, but which were very far from being ſo. This very clearly appeared in an ordinance, of the twenty-ninth of November, for aſſembling ſuch as had not freely contributed. Charles, conſidering this ordinance as a very expreſs breach of the law, iſſued out a proclamation, injoining all his ſubjects not to ſubmit to it. He publiſhed another of the ſame tenor, commanding all perſons not to execute the ordinance of parliament for paying tonage and poundage to the two houſes. All this was founded upon the laws, requiring the royal aſſent for impoſition of taxes. But ſuch were the times, that a ſtrict obſervance of the laws was become impracticable. The parliament anſwered this laſt proclamation, not by acknowledging the laws were violated by their ordinance, but by ſaying, that the ſtatute urged by King Charles was made to hinder the Sovereign from impoſing any tax, without conſent of both houſes, and not to diveſt the parliament of a right to impoſe what they pleaſed. It is eaſy to perceive this was a mere cavil, ſince the King's conſent was no leſs neceſſary for impoſing a tax, than that of both houſes: or rather, they had no right, neither the one nor the other ſeparately, had the laws been obſerved. Nevertheleſs Charles, in the inſuing February, iſſued a ſecond proclamation ordering, that the cuſtoms upon goods imported ſhould be paid him at Oxford, which very ſeemingly was not performed. This ſubject ſo often returns, not only concerning money-levies, but likewiſe with relation to every thing injoined ſeparately by the King or both houſes, that it will not be amiſs to have ſome knowledge of the principles of both parties, in order to avoid paſſing a wrong judgment (3).

Remarks on the principles King Charles would have eſtabliſhed.

Ever ſince this parliament firſt opened, King Charles had conſtantly profeſſed a ſtrict adherence to the national laws: this he perpetually oppoſed to the conduct and pretenſions of the parliament. When the war was begun, he in like manner pretended that the laws were to be obſerved with the ſame ſtrictneſs as in full peace. It is very viſible

(2) And by theſe means, ſays lord Clarendon (Vol. II. p. 67.) the King was able to pay his foot, tho' it amounted to above 3000 l. weekly.

(3) According to ſome writers, the parliament raiſed in all upon the nation, during the courſe of the civil war and afterwards, above ninety five millions, five hundred and twelve thouſand pounds. And, according to mr. Walker, they levied, from the year 1641 to 1647, above forty millions in money, and money-worth. See Hiſt. of Taxes, p. 289, 297. In March 1642, they made an ordinance for raiſing thirty four thouſand, one hundred and eight pounds, thirteen ſhillings per week. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 150.

how advantageous to him this principle was. Legally, the two houſes could not raiſe either men or money, much leſs imploy them againſt their Sovereign; for he always ſuppoſed the war was, on his part, only defenſive. He found therefore no better way to reſtore the public tranquillity, than by adhering to the laws, on the obſervance whereof depended the nation's felicity. Nothing was truer than this principle, taken in general, and independently of the particular caſe the kingdom was in. But, as Charles himſelf acknowledged, the laws being only an empty name, if not kept, and the executive power being lodged in the Sovereign's hands, the point was to know, Whether this Sovereign could be relied on for the diſcharge of this truſt, after what had paſſed the fifteen firſt years of his reign? There lay the difficulty of the queſtion between King and parliament; to ſolve which Charles offered only his bare word, whereon the parliament could not or would not rely. It is evident that, when King Charles urged in his behalf the law to that effect, he ſaid nothing which any way prejudiced the parliament's claims. The point was not to know, Whether the laws aſcribed ſuch or ſuch prerogatives to the Sovereign? The parliament did not deny it: but the queſtion was, Whether the King was to be truſted with the executive power, after what had paſſed? So the whole difficulty conſiſted in knowing, by what means the execution of theſe ſame laws, agreed to by both parties, might be ſecured. King Charles carefully avoided the examination of this point, Whether the people had a right to demand ſecurity of him, and imployed his utmoſt indeavors to reduce the diſpute to this, "Whether this or "that were injoined by the laws?" This is the reigning principle in all his papers, none excepted.

Contrariwiſe, the parliament were no leſs imbaraſſed. True, they manifeſtly made appear, that Charles had abuſed his prerogatives, while he fully injoyed them, and from thence infered, it was neceſſary to reduce his power within certain bounds: but they ſuppoſed that, in order to reduce him within theſe bounds, there was no other means than to ſtrip him intirely of this ſame power, by depriving him of the command of the militia, and ſome other prerogatives. The queſtion in this reſpect was therefore, Whether it was poſſible to find expedients which, being added to the King's word and oath, might ſecure to the nation their liberties. But the two houſes induſtriouſly avoided entering upon that queſtion. They were contented to ſuppoſe, without alleging any poſitive proof, that the King had taken arms to deſtroy the privileges of people and parliament, and conſequently the war was but defenſive on their part. By that, they pretended to vindicate their daily manifeſt breaches of the laws, repreſenting them as abſolutely neceſſary to attain the end they propoſed to themſelves, of ſetling the kingdom's tranquillity. In this procedure, one can ſcarce help perceiving the aim of certain men, who labored to render all accommodation impracticable, the better to execute the project of altering church-government, to which a peace would have brought inſuperable obſtacles. Could King Charles have prevailed with himſelf to conſent to that change, expedients would not have been wanted to adjuſt the other points. We ſhall be convinced of this hereafter, when we come to ſee the difficulties of a pacification reduced, as I may ſay, to this ſingle article.

Charles, as I obſerved, had ſent the earl of Newcaſtle northwards, to gain to his party the biſhoprick of Durham, with the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland and Weſtmoreland, and to levy forces. That earl happily executed his Majeſty's orders. He ſo managed, that theſe four counties entered into aſſociation to furniſh him, at the common expenſe, with men and money; ſo that he raiſed an army eight thouſand ſtrong. But at the ſame time, he taught the King's enemies to form like aſſociations, which perhaps they would never have thought of. As ſoon as the parliament was informed of this aſſociation, they ordered the like to be entered into by the counties which owned their authority, and appointed generals to command their forces. Lord Fairfax was made general of Yorkſhire; ſir William Brereton of Cheſhire; ſir William Waller of Hampſhire; lord Gray of Lancaſhire; major-general Brown of Berkſhire; the earl of Denbigh of Shropſhire; colonel Middleton of Wales; and the earl of Mancheſter of Eſſex and the counties adjoining, ſtiled the Eaſtern counties, viz. Eſſex, Cambridge, Iſle of Ely, Hertford, Norfolk, Suffolk, and the city of Norwich (1). By means of theſe aſſociations, the parliament had forces always ready, who indeed were deſigned only for the defenſe of the aſſociated counties, but were however imployed ſometimes in other ſervices. Charles frequently labored to prevent theſe aſſociations in counties where he knew he had a good number of friends, as in Kent, and ſome others: but when both houſes perceived the King's practiſes were like to prevail in any of the counties where they were ſuperior, they obliged them to aſſociate with others, and furniſh their quota.

Beſide theſe aſſociations between counties of the ſame party, there were likewiſe, at the begining of this war, private agreements between neighboring counties of different parties, to obſerve between them a perfect neutrality. Theſe agreements were founded on the common advantages of the contracting counties, as they removed the war from their own doors, and ſetled a mutual commerce between them, which they could not well be without. I have given one inſtance in the counties of Devon and Cornwal: the like agreement was made between the two parties in Yorkſhire and Cheſhire. But the parliament refuſed to authoriſe theſe private agreements, becauſe they were too advantageous to the King, who in the end would have been able, by this means, to aſſemble all his forces in one place, whereas he was obliged to diſperſe them throughout the whole kingdom. Beſide, the royaliſts had ſo well managed matters for their patron, that theſe agreements were made only in places where it was for his advantage; as for example, in Yorkſhire, where their ſole view was to ſtop the inroads of the gariſon of Pomtfret-caſtle, which greatly annoyed the city of York.

King Charles, retiring to Oxford, after the Brentford affair, carried thither the priſoners taken at Brentford and Edge-hill. Some few days after his return, he granted to ſir Robert Heath a commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, to try ſome of theſe priſoners, among whom was captain John Lilburn, who, with ſeveral others, was ſentenced to death for being taken in arms againſt his Majeſty. The parliament, having notice of this ſentence before its execution, declared, that if any priſoner of war ſhould be put to death at Oxford, or elſewhere, they would do the like by ſuch priſoners as were or ſhould be taken hereafter. His Majeſty's friends attempt ſowing diſcord in London. p. 82, 83.

Tho' the meaſures of King Charles's partiſans, to oblige the parliament to make peace were, as I ſaid, diſconcerted, yet were they not diſcouraged. As his Majeſty had, ſince the Brentford affair, fortified Reading, and left there a ſtrong gariſon, they pretended the Londoners had cauſe to be extremely alarmed at their neighborhood. So, under color of preventing the danger, they drew a petition, to which they procured as many hands as poſſible, to deſire leave of both houſes to preſent his Majeſty ſome propoſitions which he might conſent to with honor. Many of the inhabitants of Weſtminſter, and of the pariſhes of St. Martin's and Covent-garden, known to be the King's adherents, prepared alſo a like petition. It was very uncommon, and of dangerous conſequence, for private perſons, without the magiſtrates interpoſition or approbation, to take upon them to make the King overtures of peace. Accordingly, the parliament would not receive their petition; nay, ordered that the authors ſhould be proceeded againſt. Probably, they did not expect the parliament would make uſe of their mediation for a peace: but in publiſhing this petition, wherein they ſtiled themſelves, 'the "richeſt and moſt conſiderable inhabitants of "London,' their aim was to inſinuate to the public, that the honeſt part of the citizens wiſhed for peace upon terms more moderate than did the parliament, but were reſtrained by the magiſtrates. The two houſes, fully perceiving the motives of this petition, ſo ordered, that the mayor, aldermen and common-council of London, ſent Charles a very humble petition, wherein they took care to clear themſelves from all diſloyalty, and expreſſed a moſt earneſt deſire of peace. To that purpoſe, they beſought his Majeſty to return to his parliament, accompanied with his royal, not martial attendance; to the end whatſoever was amiſs in church and ſtate might be reformed by the advice of both houſes, and ſuch a peace obtained, as ſhould be for his Majeſty's honor, and his peoples welfare. This petition ſhewed, that the city of London deſired no other peace than what the parliament ſhould pleaſe to agree upon with his Majeſty. It had over the former one this advantage, that it came from the mayor and common-council, whereas that was ſubſcribed only by private perſons.

They deſire leave to petition the King: not granted by the parliament.

Petition of the mayor and aldermen of London. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 110. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 82, 83.

The King's anſwer: p. 85.

King Charles was really perſuaded, that the Londoners deſired and would accept of ſuch a peace as he ſhould be pleaſed to grant, but that the magiſtrates, in concert with the parliament, did their utmoſt to prevent it. This petition being preſented him the tenth of January, 1642-3, he returned a very gracious anſwer, and gave it in writing to the commitee of aldermen. He ſaid, "That he never entertained any miſapprehenſion "of the loyalty of his city of London, or of the "inhabitants in general: but could not ſay the "ſame with regard to their magiſtrates, and par-"ticularly alderman Pennington, their pretended "lord-mayor, and two or three more (1), who "indeavored, with all their power, to pervert the "people, and excite them to rebellion. Then he "enumerated all the outrages exerciſed at Lon-"don upon himſelf and the laws, and aſſured, "he was ready to return to them, when they "ſhould be in a fit poſture to receive him with "honor and ſafety, and had apprehended the "diſturbers of the public peace, that they might be "proceeded againſt by courſe of law, as guilty of "high-treaſon." This Prince flattered himſelf extremely with reſpect to his papers, which he fondly looked on as unanſwerable: but the grand effects he hoped would thence accrue did not always anſwer his expectations. In this ſentiment, when he delivered his anſwer in writing to the commitee of aldermen, he told them, it was his deſire it ſhould be read publicly at a common-hall, and before the people. The lord-mayor, with the conſent of both houſes, readily gave his Majeſty this ſatisfaction, and his anſwer was accordingly read in public: but the parliament had ſent a commitee of peers and commoners to be preſent at the reading, and then to reject the whole. This did mr. Pym, one of the commitee, in a ſet ſpeech, the deſign whereof was to ſhew, that this paper abounded throughout with ſcandalous and injurious aſperſions upon the city and parliament. So King Charles had little reaſon to be ſatisfied with the ſucceſs of his anſwer, whereon he had however highly depended, imagining it would be capable of ſowing diſcord between the Londoners and magiſtrates.

and replied to by Pym. p. 88. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 113.

A few days after, King Charles ſent the ſherifs of London a declaration, grievouſly complaining of Pym's ſpeech, and of the publication of a pamphlet in the city, in his name, as if he retracted his former promiſes. He required alſo the maſter and wardens of the ſeveral companies of the city, to ſummon all their members, and read this declaration, with his fore-mentioned anſwer, publicly in their reſpective halls. He declared that Iſaac Pennington, not being regularly elected according to their charter, or lawfully admited, could not be looked on as lord-mayor of London, and ordered the ſherifs to commit him to ſafe cuſtody, with ſome other aldermen: but the parliament, perceiving Charles's drift was to ſtir up the people of London againſt their magiſtrates, commanded the ſherifs not to execute this order.

Charles's order to the ſherifs of London. Jan. 17. p. 120.

As the King frequently ſent private agents to London, to correſpond with his friends there, and to be fully informed of what paſſed in the city and parliament, both houſes thought proper, in order to render this practiſe more difficult, to declare, that all perſons coming from the King's quarters, to London, without a ſafe-conduct, ſhould be treated as ſpies.

Order of both houſes concerning ſpies. Jan. 16. p. 117, 118.

During this winter, before opening the ſecond campain, the conteſt about the number of Papiſts in the King's and the parliament's ſervice was renewed, on occaſion of ſome papers, publiſhed by the earl of Newcaſtle and lord Fairfax againſt each other. That earl denied not his having Papiſts in his army: but maintained, they were few in number; and beſide, it was lawful to imploy them, ſince it was not on account of their perſuaſion but for their loyalty. He contrariwiſe affirmed, there were great numbers in the parliament's army; and, in juſtification of what he advanced, appealed to their muſter-rolls. This proof I muſt own ſeems not to me of any validity: ſince theſe rolls were not publiſhed, and conſequently not eaſy to be examined by every one; nor was very poſſibly the religion of the inliſted officers and ſoldiers ſpecified (2). Howſoever this be, his Majeſty and the earl of Newcaſtle loudly aſſerted, that the parliament's army ſwarmed with Catholics. Lord Clarendon has alſo affirmed as much; but in all their writings, not a ſingle Papiſt is named: whereas the parliament produced liſts of Popiſh officers in the King's ſervice, with their names, quality and imploys. Beſide, it may readily be perceived, that King Charles, anſwerably to his principles and his deportment towards the Papiſts, from the very begining of his reign, made no ſcruple to imploy them, and that they could themſelves expect ſome advantage in ſerving him: but what intereſt the parliament could have to imploy Romaniſts, or what advantage could accrue to them from ſuch ſervice, does not ſo clearly appear. Nevertheleſs, the imputation perpetually afterwards caſt on this Prince, of having Popiſh armies, becauſe he refuſed not the aſſiſtance of Papiſts, and the conſequence drawn thence, that his deſign was to deſtroy the Proteſtant religion, muſt be deemed a notorious exageration, and a mere calumny to render him odious.

Supplies ſent to Charles from Holland. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 416. Vol. II. p. 109.

Since his Queen's being in Holland, ſhe had not been idle. She labored effectually to procure officers, arms and ammunition for her royal conſort, which was facilitated by the credit of their ſon-in-law, the Prince of Orange. September 1642, both houſes deputed Walter Strickland, to the Hague, as their agent, complaining to the ſtates of the preparations making in Holland for King Charles, and of the ſupplies already ſent him. But Strickland met with a very cold reception, by reaſon of the Prince of Orange's credit in the aſſembly of the ſtates-general. Beſide, the ſtates did not conſider him as a public miniſter, becauſe hitherto the parliament had never ſent agents abroad, in their own name. They were contented therefore to depute one member of their aſſembly, to learn what he had to ſay. Strickland put into their hands a declaration from the parliament, the purport whereof was:

The parliament ſends Strickland to the Hague: who is coldly received. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 157.

He delivered to the ſtates a declaration of both houſes. Ibid. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 69.

"That the lords and commons underſtood, by "a certain intercepted letter of lord Digby's, that "he had addreſſed himſelf to the Prince of Orange, "and by his countenance and help made proviſion of great quantities of ordnance, powder, "arms and diverſe other ſorts of warlike proviſion: and the ſaid Prince, the better to incou-"rage diverſe commanders of Engliſh regiments "in the ſtates ſervice to reſort to the King's aid "againſt the parliament, had promiſed to reſerve "their places for them in their abſenſe.

"That they could not believe, this was done "by any authority of the ſtates, conſidering "the great help they had received from England, "when they lay under the heavy oppreſſion of "their Princes. Neither could they think, that "they would be forward in helping to make ſlaves "of thoſe who had been uſeful and aſſiſtant in "making them freemen: or that they would for-"get, that the troubles and dangers of them both "iſſued from the ſame fountain, and that thoſe "who were ſet at work to undermine religion "and liberty, in England, were the ſame who, "by open force, had ſought to do the like in "the Low-countries.

"That it could not be unknown to them, that "the jeſuitical faction had corrupted the King's "counſels; and the conſciences of a great part of "the clergy, ploted to deſtroy the parliament, "raiſed a cruel rebellion in Ireland, indeavored to "divide the King from his parliament and people, "and by falſe ſlanders inſenſed his Majeſty ſo, "as that he had reſolved to ſet up his ſtandard, "and draw his ſword for the deſtruction of his "people, whom, by the laws and conſtitutions "of the kingdom, he is bound to preſerve and "protect.

"That the queſtion was not, whether the King "ſhould injoy the ſame prerogative and power "which belonged to former Kings, his predeceſ-"ſors; but whether that prerogative and power "ſhould be imployed to the defenſe or the ruin "of the kingdom.

"That it could not be denied, but that it "would be more honor and wealth, ſafety and "greatneſs to his Majeſty, in concuring with his "parliament, than in the courſe he was in; but "that his counſellors looked more upon the pre-"vailing of their own party, than upon any of "thoſe great advantages which he might obtain by "joining with his people.

"That both houſes had lately expreſſed ſo "earneſt inclinations to a national love and amity "with the United Provinces, that they had pe-"titioned his Majeſty they might be joined with "them in a more near and ſtrait league and union; "and that they could not but expect ſome returns "from them of the like expreſſions: therefore "deſired, they would be ſo far from blowing the "fire which began to kindle among them, that "they would rather indeavor to quench it, by "ſtrengthening and incouraging them, who had "no other deſign but not to be deſtroyed, and "to preſerve their religion."

Holland and Zealand promiſe to ſtand neutral. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 159, 160.

This declaration was long neglected, th eſtates-general not vouchſafing to return any anſwer. At length, Strickland having preſented it to the ſtates of Holland, they promiſed to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality, and ingaged the province of Zealand to take the ſame reſolution. They even arreſted ſome ſhips, laden with ammunition and ſoldiers on King Charles's account. Then the ſtates-general could not any longer avoid taking notice of the parliament's declaration, and returned in anſwer: "That "they would expreſly forbid all perſons whatever, "to tranſport into England any weapons or war-"like ammunitions, and would gladly imploy "their mediation for terminating the troubles."

Anſwer of the ſtates-general: p. 160.

But this could not hinder the indirect ſupplies which were tranſmited thence to Charles, by reaſon of the Prince of Orange's great credit. During the winter, general King, a Scot, brought his Majeſty ordnance and ammunition, and general Goring conveyed over ſeveral Engliſh officers, who ſerved the ſtates. Indeed, every now and then, the parliament's ſhips failed not of laying hold on veſſels ſo freighted for his Majeſty's uſe. Strickland frequently complained of theſe ſupplies: but the ſtates-general took little notice: nay, they granted the Queen, who was preparing to return to England, ſo large and general paſſport, that by virtue thereof ſhe might tranſport into England troops, ordnance, arms and ammunition, in what quantities ſhe pleaſed. However, the ſtates of Holland, whom it concerned to keep fair with the parliament, ſtayed one of her Majeſty's tranſports, laden with ammunition: whereupon ſhe delivered in a proteſtation. Very ſeemingly, they hereby aimed at managing both parties; the parliament, by ſeizing one of her ſhips; and the Queen, by ſtoping but one out of many. We ſhall hereafter find the ſupply brought Charles by his Queen to have been very conſiderable. She arrived about mid- February in Burlington-bay, and thence went to York, where ſhe continued ſome time.

King Charles, as I obſerved, conſtantly inſiſted on the laws of the land, and urged, that they ought to be regarded in war-time as in peace. The admitance of this principle would have turned greatly to his advantage; for the laws, not ſuppoſing any actual diviſion between King and parliament, aſcribed aſcribed to the King ſundry prerogatives which he could have made uſe of againſt his opponents. For inſtance, by virtue of the prerogative, he pretended to adjourn the courts of juſtice to Oxford, during Hillary-term; but the parliament would not give their conſent.

Decemb. 7. 1642. p. 98, 146.

Contrariwiſe, the counties being divided between the two parties, the parliament addreſſed his Majeſty, repreſenting the inconveniencies which would follow the holding aſſizes in the ſeveral counties (ſome whereof were for himſelf, and ſome for the parliament) beſought him to agree to their being defered to a more convenient ſeaſon. But Charles poſitively refuſed it, under color of the neceſſity of puniſhing malefactors at all times. Had he gained this point, he might have condemned as rebels all ſuch as had taken arms againſt him; for the judges muſt have adminiſtered juſtice according to law, which, not ſuppoſing any open war between King and parliament, condemns indiſcriminately all who are in arms againſt the Sovereign. But the caſe in which England then was, being wholly extraordinary and unexpected, the parliament pretended, the laws could not be executed in that reſpect, without ſome reſtriction and explication. For this reaſon, they deſired the aſſizes ſhould be ſuſpended, 'till ſome means might be agreed on for rendering juſtice impartially: but finding the King refuſed conſenting to it, they publiſhed an ordinance, forbiding the aſſizes to be held 'till farther order.

p. 145.

Tho' the war commenced in April, 1642, and a battle, with ſeveral ſkirmiſhes, had been fought, Charles could ſcarcely be perſuaded, that the very perſons who were in arms againſt him, could or durſt refuſe the obedience due to him. Of this notion he gave a very evident proof in March, 1642-3, on the following occaſion. The city of Briſtol being in the parliament's hands, Charles had gained mr. Robert Yeoman * one of the chief citizens, and ſent him a commiſſion to raiſe forces, and appoint what commanders he thought proper; Yeoman's deſign being to ſurrender the city to his Majeſty. To that purpoſe, he joined with one Bourchier, another leading citizen, and they both formed a plot, into which many of the inhabitants entered, to ſeize Briſtol for the King. This conſpiracy being diſcovered the very night it was to be executed, the chief ploters were impriſoned, and the parliament ſent down a commiſſion to the governor, colonel Nathaniel Fiennes, to call a council of war, and proceed againſt thoſe priſoners by martial law. The chief conſpirators being condemned to die, Charles wrote to the governor by general Ruthen, that if he put to death theſe men, ſome priſoners in his hands ſhould undergo the ſame fate. Fiennes returned the general a civil anſwer: but in ſhewing him however, the difference between priſoners of war, and ſecret ſpies and conſpirators, he threatened, in his turn, there would be frequent opportunities, in the courſe of this war, for the parliament to uſe repriſals. Hereupon his Majeſty ſent a thundering letter to the mayor and aldermen of Briſtol, commanding them, as well as all the inhabitants, to riſe againſt the governor and gariſon, and free the condemned priſoners. It was eaſy to forſee the mayor would ill obey this order. Accordingly the priſoners † were executed, without the King's thinking proper to proceed in like manner againſt the priſoners in his power.

Before we proceed to what paſſed in the ſecond campain of the year 1643, I think it abſolutely neceſſary to ſhew the diſpoſition of both King and parliament, as to peace and war. Military actions depending upon many circumſtances of time, place, number and bravery of the troops, conduct and abilities of the officers, theſe things indeed are ingredients of hiſtory, but not the chief. If in the recital of warlike exploits, the end of hiſtory was to teach the art of war, all the circumſtances of the ſieges, battles, ſkirmiſhes, &c. would be eſſential: but there is another end more material to the generality of readers, i. e. to know the cauſes and grounds of the begining and continuance of wars, and conſequently the intereſts, motives and artifices of the parties concerned, whence proceed military actions. This is the reaſon why I reſolved to be brief in the deſcription of battles, in order to be more copious upon the above-ſpecified points, which I look on as what is moſt conſiderable. Nothing, in my opinion, is properer to ſhew the real diſpoſitions of King and parliament, than the treaty at Oxford, in March and April 1643, concerning a peace: and therefore I determined on giving a circumſtantial account of that negociation; and the rather, as I ſhall thereby avoid the neceſſity of explaining afterwards many particulars, which otherwiſe might not be perfectly comprehended.

Posture of the King's and parliament's affairs.

CHARLES I AN' 1642.

Both houſes, having conſidered that King Charles made ſome advantage of the inclination he had conſtantly expreſſed for peace, deſired a ſafe-conduct for commiſſioners they intended to ſend him; which his Majeſty granting, the commiſſioners preſented him certain propoſitions, as proper to ſerve for foundation to a peace. Ruſhworth has preſerved, in his collections, two ſpeeches made in council upon this occaſion: the earl of Briſtol's, to perſuade his Majeſty to continue the war; and the earl of Dorſet's, to demonſtrate the advantages and neceſſity of a peace. Here follows the ſubſtance of Briſtol's reaſons.

The parliament deſires a ſafe-conduct to treat for a pacification. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 164.

The earl of Briſtol's ſpeech for continuing the war. Feb. 1. p. 127.

" 1. That the parliament had declared diverſe " of the greateſt and moſt eminent among the no- " bility delinquents in the higheſt nature; ſo that " there could not be any accommodation, with- " out the utter ruin of themſelves and their fa- " milies.

" 2. But granting that this article was removed, " his Majeſty could not condeſcend with his honor " to beg peace of his ſubjects.

" 3. That no mention could be found, in the " hiſtory of Spain, of inteſtine and civil wars, be- " cauſe they were truly ſubjects, and their Sove- " reign truly a Sovereign. But ſince in England " the ſtate would neither be ſo to the King, nor " ſuffer the King to be ſo to them, he thought " they ſhould be compelled to it.

" 4. That it was no diſhonor for ſubjects to con- " deſcend to their King; but it was an exceſſive " diminution to his Majeſty's royalty, to ſubmit " himſelf to his ſubjects.

" 5. His opinion therefore was, that his Ma- " jeſty ſhould neither propound to the parliament, " or receive from them any conditions for peace, " but ſuch as ſhould abſolutely comply with the " regal dignity and prerogative, and ſuch as " might be no way prejudicial to his Majeſty's " ſervants and counſellors, or their eſtates.

" 6. That there was an army on foot which " could, by force, compel that which fair words " could not effect."

Contrariwiſe, the earl of Dorſet repreſented:

The earl of Dorſet's ſpeech for an accommodation. p. 128.

" 1. That peace, and a ſudden one, was abſo- " lutely neceſſary between his Majeſty and the par- " liament.

" 2. That he would not adviſe them to im- " brace a peace which ſhould be more diſavanta- " geous than the war; a peace which would de- " ſtroy the eſtates and families of the nobility. " But it was to be conſidered, that the parliament " declared that only againſt delinquents, ſuch as " they conjectured had miſcounſelled his Majeſty, " and were authors of the tumults in the common- " wealth. But this declaration of theirs, except

" ſuch

Charles I An' 1642.

" ſuch crimes could be proved againſt them, were " of no validity; the parliament would do no- " thing unjuſtly, nor condemn the innocent: and " certainly innocent men needed not fear to ap- " pear before any judges whatſoever. He who " ſhould, for any cauſe, prefer his private good " before the public utilty, was but a bad ſon of the " common-wealth.

" 3. That the buſineſs of the kingdom was, to " ſtudy reconciling all differences between his Ma- " jeſty and his parliament, and ſo to reconcile " them, that they ſhould no way prejudice his " royal prerogative, of which the parliament be- " ing a loyal defender (knowing the ſubject's pro- " perty dependent on it) would never indeavor to " be an infringer; ſo that if doubts and jealouſies " were taken away by a fair treaty between his " Majeſty and the parliament, no doubt a means " might be deviſed to rectify differences.

" 4. That in Spain, the ſubjects were ſcarcely " removed a degree from ſlaves, or the Sovereign " from a tyrant. But in England the ſubjects had, " by a long and received liberty, made their free- " dom reſult into a ſecond nature: neither was it " ſafe for the Kings to ſtrive to introduce the Spa- " niſh government upon this free-born nation, nor " juſt for the people to ſuffer that government to " be inforced upon them; which he was certain " his Majeſty's goodneſs never intended.

" 5. Granting that his Majeſty had an army of " gallant and able men, yet he had infinite diſ- " advantages on his ſide; the parliament having " double his number, and ſurely perſons of as " much bravery, nay, and ſure to be daily ſup- " plied when any of their number failed; a bene- " fit which his Majeſty could not boaſt of, they " having the moſt popular part of the kingdom at " their devotion; all, or moſt of the cities, con- " ſiderable towns and ports, together with the " manifeſt pillar of the kingdom's ſafety, the ſea, " at their command, and the navy: and which " was moſt material of all, an unexhauſted Indies " of money to pay their ſoldiers, out of the liberal " contributions of coin and plate ſent by people of " all conditions, who accounted the parliament's " cauſe their own.

" 6. All which things conſidered, he concluded " it neceſſary to beſeech his Majeſty, to take ſome " preſent order for a treaty of peace between him- " ſelf, and his high-court of parliament."

What was the reſult of the council's deliberations, does not any where appear: but it may be judged, by what followed, that King Charles better reliſhed Briſtol's reaſons, than he did Dorſet's. I return to the Oxford treaty.

An' 1643. The parliament demand a peace, but deſire it not.

Vol. II. p. 89.

The parliament, having to guard againſt the artifices of Charles's partiſans, who were ſtrenuouſly laboring to perſuade the people, that a war was carrying on merely in behalf of ſome members, could not better contradict them, than by openly ſuing the King for peace, and by publiſhing the terms on which they were ready to conclude it. They wanted to ſhew by theſe terms, that it was not the private intereſt of ſome of their members which put them upon action, but ſolely the kingdom's welfare and ſecurity. However, they knew at the ſame time Charles would not accept them. That Prince, on his part, was obliged to make appear he wiſhed for peace, ſince he had always pretended to have armed purely in his own defenſe: but the truth is, he deſired it no more than the parliament, becauſe he ſaw, it was no favorable juncture to obtain ſuch a peace as he expected, with a full reſtoration of all his prerogatives. Thus, tho' neither King nor parliament had any intention ſincerely to indeavor a pacification, they were however both indiſpenſibly obliged to expreſs their deſire of it, not to give the people occaſion to believe, they prefered their private intereſt to public welfare. For this reaſon, Charles perpetually inſiſted on reſtoring the laws to their priſtine vigor, and the parliament on ſecurity for the obſervance of the ſame laws, and thereby both rendered all accommodation utterly impracticable. The ſubſtance of the propoſitions preſented Charles by the parliament was to this effect.

Neither is it deſired by Charles.

Charles I An' 1643.

" I. That the armies on both ſides be diſbanded, " and his Majeſty be pleaſed to return to his par- " liament.

The parliament's propoſitions. February 1. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. p. 165. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 91.

" II. That he leave delinquents to a legal trial, " and judgment of parliament.

" III. That the Papiſts be diſbanded and diſ- " armed.

" IV. That his Majeſty be pleaſed to give the " royal aſſent to the following bills:

" 1. For taking away ſuperſtitious innovations.

" 2. For the utter aboliſhing all archbiſhops, " biſhops, deans, &c.

" 3. Againſt ſcandalous miniſters.

" 4. Againſt pluralities.

" 5. For conſultation with godly, religious and " learned divines. That his Majeſty be pleaſed to " promiſe paſſing ſuch other bills for ſetling church- " government, as, upon conſultation with the aſ- " ſembly of the ſaid divines, ſhall be reſolved on " by both houſes of parliament.

" V. That his Majeſty be pleaſed to give his " conſent, that an oath may be eſtabliſhed by act " of parliament, to be adminiſtered in ſuch manner, " as by both houſes ſhall be agreed on; wherein " they ſhall abjure and renounce the Pope's ſupre- " macy, the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation, pur- " gatory, worſhiping the conſecrated hoſt, cruci- " fixes, and images; and that the refuſing the ſaid " oath, being tendered in ſuch manner as ſhall be " appointed by act of parliament, ſhall be a ſuffi- " cient conviction in law of recuſancy.

" And that his Majeſty be pleaſed to conſent to,

" 1. A bill for the education of the children of " Papiſts by Proteſtants.

" 2. To a bill for the true levying of the penal- " ties againſt recuſants, in ſuch manner as both " houſes of parliament ſhall agree on.

" 3. To a bill whereby the practiſe of Papiſts " againſt the ſtate may be prevented.

" VI. That the earl of Briſtol and lord Herbert, " may be removed from his Majeſty's councils and " court, and that they may not bear any office, " or have any imployments concerning the ſtate or " common-wealth.

" VII. That the militia be ſetled in ſuch a man- " ner, as ſhall be agreed on by both houſes.

" VIII. That his Majeſty be pleaſed to appoint " for judges, ſuch and ſuch perſons, naming them, " with the clauſe, ' Quam diu ſe bene geſſerint.'

" IX. That all ſuch perſons as have been put " out of the commiſſion of peace, &c. ſince the " firſt day of April 1642, may again be put into " them; and that ſuch perſons may be removed " as ſhall be excepted againſt by both houſes of " parliament.

" X. That his Majeſty be pleaſed to paſs the " bill preſented him to vindicate and ſecure the " privileges of parliament, from the ill conſe- " quence of the late precedent in the charge and " proceeding againſt lord Kimbolton, and the five " members of the houſe of commons.

" XI. That his Majeſty's royal aſſent may be " given unto ſuch acts as ſhall be adviſed by both " houſes of parliament, for the ſatisfying and pay- " ing the debts and damages, wherein the two " houſes of parliament have ingaged the public " faith of the kingdom.

" XII. That

CHARLES I AN' 1643.

" XII. That his Majeſty be pleaſed to enter into " a ſtrict alliance with the ſtates of the United-" Provinces, and other neighboring Princes and " ſtates of the Proteſtant religion.

" XIII. That, in the general pardon which his " Majeſty hath been pleaſed to offer to his ſub-" jects, all offenſes and miſdemeanors commited " before the tenth of January 1641, which have " been, or ſhall be queſtioned in parliament be-" fore the tenth of January 1643, ſhall be ex-" cepted; which offenſes and miſdemeanors ſhall " nevertheleſs be taken and adjudged to be fully " diſcharged againſt all other inferior courts: that " likewiſe there ſhall be an exception of offenſes " commited by any perſons, who have had any " hand in the rebellion of Ireland: and an exception " of William earl of Newcaſtle, and George lord " Digby.

" XIV. That his Majeſty will be pleaſed to re-" ſtore ſuch members of either houſe of parliament " to their ſeveral places, out of which they have " been put ſince the begining of this parliament; " that they may receive ſatisfaction and reparation " for thoſe places; and that all others may be re-" ſtored to their offices and imployments, who " have been put out of the ſame upon any diſplea-" ſure conceived againſt them, for any aſſiſtance " given to both houſes of parliament, or obeying " their commands, or forbearing to leave their " attendance upon the parliament without licenſe, " or for any other occaſion ariſing from the dif-" ferences between his Majeſty, and his par-" liament."

Charles conſents to a treaty.

Theſe propoſitions manifeſtly evidenced that, tho' both houſes ſued for a treaty in order for a pacification, they were however very far from it, ſince they inſiſted on matters which King Charles would ſcarcely have granted, had his condition been much worſe than it was at that time. Nevertheleſs, as he had talked very much of his offer, in Auguſt laſt, to treat of a peace, and of the refuſal of both houſes, he did not think it adviſeable abſolutely to reject theſe propoſitions. He therefore conſented, that they ſhould be diſcuſſed in a treaty; but gave on his own part ſix others, viz.

Propoſitions. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 169. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 95.

" I. That his Majeſty's own revenue, maga-" zines, towns, forts and ſhips which have been " taken or kept from him by force, be forthwith " reſtored unto him.

" II. That whatſoever had been done, or pub-" liſhed, contrary to the laws of this land, or de-" rogatory to his Majeſty's power and rights, be " renounced and recalled.

" III. That whatſoever illegal power hath been " claimed and exerciſed by both, or either houſe, " over his ſubjects, as impriſoning their perſons " without law, ſtoping their Habeas Corpus, and " impoſing upon their eſtates without act of par-" liament, be diſclaimed, and all ſuch perſons ſo " commited forthwith diſcharged.

" IV. That a bill be framed for the better pre-" ſerving the Book of Common-prayer from " the ſcorn and violence of Browniſts, Anabaptiſts, " and other ſectaries, with proper clauſes for the " eaſe of tender conſciences.

" V. That all ſuch perſons as, upon the treaty, " ſhall be excepted out of the general pardon, " ſhall be tried 'per pares,' according to the uſual " courſe and known law of this land.

" VI. And, to the intent this treaty may not ſuffer " interruption by any intervening accidents, that a " ceſſation of arms and free trade for all his Ma-" jeſty's ſubjects be firſt agreed upon."

He deſires a ceſſation may be firſt ſetled.

Some days after, Charles ſent a meſſage to both houſes, deſiring that his laſt propoſition might be firſt taken into conſideration, to the end that, during the ceſſation as peace might be treated of with the greater tranquillity; to which they conſented. CHARLES I AN' 1643.

It was the twenty-eighth of February before both houſes ſent his Majeſty the conditions whereon they propoſed to conclude a ſuſpenſion of arms, during the treaty; viz.

Articles for a ceſſation ſent by the parliament. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 170.

" 1. That all manner of arms, ammunition, " victuals, money, bullion, and all other commo-" dities, paſſing without ſuch ſafe-conduct as may " warrant their paſſage, may be ſtayed and ſeized, " as if no ſuch ceſſation was agreed on.

" 2. The ſame with regard to all manner of per-" ſons paſſing without ſuch a ſafe-conduct.

" 3. That his Majeſty's forces, in Oxfordſhire, " ſhall advance no nearer to Windſor than Wheatly, " and, in Buckinghamſhire, no nearer to Ayleſ-" bury than Brill; and that, in Berks, the forces " reſpectively ſhall not advance nearer the one to " the other than they now are; and that the par-" liament's forces in Oxfordſhire ſhall advance no " nearer to Oxford than Henley; and thoſe in " Buckingham no nearer to Oxford than Ayleſ-" bury: and that his Majeſty's forces ſhall take " no new quarters above twelve miles from Oxford " any way: and that the parliament's forces ſhall " take no new quarters above twelve miles from " Windſor, any way.

" 4. That no ſiege ſhall be begun or continued " againſt Gloceſter; and that his Majeſty's forces " now imployed in the ſiege ſhall return to Ciren-" ceſter and Malmſbury, or to Oxford, as ſhall " be moſt for their conveniency; and the parlia-" ment's forces which are in Gloceſterſhire, ſhall " remain in the cities of Gloceſter, Briſtol and " the caſtle and town of Berkley, or retire nearer " to Windſor, as they ſhall ſee cauſe; and that " thoſe of Wales which are drawn to Gloceſter, " ſhall return into their quarters where they " were before they drew down to Gloceſter-" ſhire.

" 5. That in caſe it be pretended on either ſide, " that the ceſſation is violated, no act of hoſtility " is immediately to follow; but firſt, the party " complaining is to acquaint the lord general on " the other ſide, and to allow three days after " notice given, for ſatisfaction. And in caſe ſatiſ-" faction be not given, or accepted, then five days " notice to be given before hoſtilities begin: and " the like to be obſerved in the remoter armies by " the commanders in chief.

" 6. Laſtly, That all the other forces, in the " kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, " and not before-mentioned, ſhall remain in the ſame " quarters and places as they are at the time of " publiſhing this ceſſation, and under the ſame " conditions as are mentioned in the articles be-" fore, and that this ceſſation ſhall not extend to " reſtrain the ſeting forth, or imploying any " ſhips for the defenſe of his Majeſty's domi-" nions."

The King's anſwer thereto. March 6. p. 172.

To theſe propoſitions Charles replied by a meſ-ſage to both houſes, complaining, " That he had " been left without any anſwer almoſt a month, " from the third to the twenty-eighth of February. " He conceived, that the articles of the ceſſation, " now preſented him, were ſo ſtrict, that ſuch of " his good ſubjects who were not of his army " would receive no benefit by the ſuſpenſion, " which he would ever inſiſt on; and therefore " he had returned the articles with ſuch alterations " as he doubted not but both houſes would con-" ſent to, ſince they ſufficiently manifeſted how " ſollicitous he was for the good of his people, " and how deſirous to prevent any more effuſion " of his ſubjects blood. He deſired the ceſſation " might begin the twelfth of March, or ſooner, " if the conditions ſhould be ſooner agreed on,

" and was willing the ſame ſhould continue for " twenty days, in which time he hoped, by the " treaty, a full peace might be eſtabliſhed through- " out the kingdom."

It muſt be obſerved that, in this negociation, King Charles propoſed to himſelf three advantages, as will hereafter appear very clearly. 1. To gain time to make his preparations. 2. To ſet on foot, by means of a ceſſation of arms, a free commerce and correſpondence between the quarters of both armies, and particularly between London and Oxford, which would help to provide himſelf of many things neceſſary for the inſuing campain, by ſending for them from London, or elſewhere. 3. To convey ſafely from York the forces and ammunition, which were arrived from Holland. All this was concealed under the pretenſe of procuring the eaſe of his people by a free commerce throughout the kingdom. Theſe are the articles which he ſent to both houſes, with the alterations he mentioned.

Propoſals made by King Charles for a ceſſation. Ibid.

" I. That all manner of arms, ammunition, " money, bullion and victuals, paſſing for the " uſe of either army, without a paſs, or ſafe- " conduct, from the generals of each army, may " be ſtayed and ſeized on, as if no ceſſation at all " was agreed on."

" II. That all other officers and ſoldiers of " either army, paſſing without licenſe or ſafe-con- " duct as aforeſaid, may be apprehended and de- " tained, as if no ceſſation was agreed upon at " all: and that all manner of perſons, his Ma- " jeſty's ſubjects, of what quality or condition ſo- " ever (except officers and ſoldiers of either army) " ſhall paſs to and from the cities of Oxford and " London, and back again at their pleaſure, " during this ceſſation, as likewiſe to and from " any other parts of his Majeſty's dominions, " without any ſearch, ſtay, or impriſonment of " their perſons, or ſeizure and detention of their " goods or eſtates: and that all manner of trade, " traffic and commerce, be free and open between " his Majeſty's ſubjects, excepting as aforeſaid be- " tween the officers and ſoldiers of either army, " or for arms, ammunition, money, bullion, or " victuals, for the uſe of either army, without a " paſs, or ſafe-conduct, as aforeſaid, which may be " a good begining to renew the trade and correſ- " pondence of the kingdom, and whereby his " good ſubjects may be reſtored to that liberty " and freedom they were born to, and have ſo " happily injoyed 'till theſe miſerable diſtractions, " and which, even during this war, his Majeſty " hath to his utmoſt labored to preſerve, opening " the way, by moſt ſtrict proclamations, to the " paſſage of all commodities, even to the city of " London itſelf.

III. The begining of this article is the ſame as in the parliament's, but the end is different, viz.

" And that the forces of neither army ſhall " advance their quarters nearer to each other, than " they ſhall be upon the day agreed on for the " ceſſation to begin; otherwiſe, in paſſage and " communication between their ſeveral quarters " reſpectively, without any acts of hoſtility each to " other, but may inlarge themſelves, within their " own quarters reſpectively, as they ſhall find " convenient.

Hereby the King was at liberty to ſend for his forces from York to Oxford, without any oppoſition from the parliament's army.

" IV. That the forces of either army in Glo- " ceſterſhire, Wiltſhire and Wales, as likewiſe in " the cities of Gloceſter, Briſtol and the caſtle " and town of Berkley, ſhall be guided by the " rule expreſſed in the latter part of the prece- " dent article.

V. This article is exactly the ſame with the parliament's.

" VI. That all other forces in the kingdom " of England, and dominion of Wales, not before " mentioned, ſhall remain in the ſame quarters " and places, as they are at the time of publiſh- " ing this ceſſation, otherwiſe than in paſſage and " communication between their ſeveral quarters, " as is mentioned in the latter part of the ſaid " article; and that this ceſſation ſhall not extend " to reſtrain the ſeting forth, or imploying any " ſhips for the defenſe of his Majeſty's dominions, " provided that his Majeſty be firſt acquainted " with the particulars, and that ſuch ſhips as " ſhall be ſet forth be commanded by ſuch perſons " as his Majeſty ſhall approve of.

" VII. Laſtly; that, during the ceſſation, none " of his Majeſty's ſubjects be impriſoned, other- " wiſe than according to the known laws of the " land; and that there ſhall be no plundering, or " violence, offered to any of his Majeſty's ſub- " jects. And his Majeſty is very willing, if there " be any ſcruples made concerning theſe propoſi- " tions and circumſtances of the ceſſation, that " the commitee for the treaty nevertheleſs " may immediately come hither, and ſo all mat- " ters concerning the ceſſation may be ſetled by " them."

Tho' both houſes were not at all pleaſed with the alterations his Majeſty had made in their articles, yet, as he offered to treat upon that ſubject, they deſired a ſafe-conduct for ſix commiſſioners, viz. the earl of Northumberland, lord Say, and four commoners. Charles immediately granted it, excepting lord Say, becauſe he was proclaimed traitor. When he ſent the ſafe-conduct, he ſignified to them by a meſſage, that he was content his propoſition concerning the magazines, &c. and theirs for diſbanding the armies, ſhould be firſt treated of and agreed; and then the ſecond of his Majeſty's, and the ſecond of theirs, and ſo in order: and that the time of treaty might not exceed twenty days.

Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 173. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 127, 146.

The parliament's five commiſſioners repairing to Oxford, preſented to his Majeſty freſh articles concerning a ceſſation: but they ſo little differed from the firſt, that Charles was not therewith at all ſatisfied, and therefore he delivered to the commiſſioners the following objections againſt the laſt articles.

The parliament's laſt articles for ceſſation. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 173.

1. They are in effect the ſame his Majeſty formerly excepted to, and there is not the leaſt mention of freedom of commerce between his ſubjects, and conſequently they have no eaſe or benefit by this ceſſation, tho' that is his Majeſty's chief aim.

Charles's objections thereto. March 23. p. 177. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 147.

2. Puting the ſhips which may be imployed under the command of perſons approved of by his Majeſty, is not conſented to by theſe articles; and by that means the conveying of any number of forces from one place to another (which is an act of hoſtility) remains free to both houſes.

3. The army raiſed by the parliament is ſpoken of, as if his Majeſty was no part of the parliament, or himſelf to have raiſed that army. Now, in order to prevent any inconveniencies which might ariſe upon real differences or miſtakes, on the latitude of expreſſions, and to avoid delays, his Majeſty deſired that the commitee might have liberty to debate any ſuch differences and expreſſions; and yet no ſuch power is given in theſe articles: and the commitee confeſſed to his Majeſty they have no liberty, but are ſtrictly bound to the very words of the articles now ſent.

4. His

Charles I An' 1643.

4. His Majeſty's deſire that, during the ceſſation, none of his ſubjects might be impriſoned otherwiſe than according to the laws of the land, is in no degree conſented to.

5. His Majeſty's deſire againſt violence is not at all taken notice of, nor is his deſire againſt plundering any way ſatisfied; his Majeſty not only meaning thereby, robbing the ſubject by the unruline's of the uncommanded ſoldiers, but particularly the violence and plundering uſed to his ſubjects, for not ſubmiting to impoſitions required from them by ordinances of one or both houſes, which are contrary to the known laws of this land.

6. Beſide, as there is no conſent given to thoſe alterations offered by his Majeſty, ſo where an abſolute conſent may be ſuppoſed, becauſe the very words of his Majeſty's articles are wholly preſerved; yet, by reaſon of the relation of ſomewhat going before, is varied by them, the ſenſe of thoſe words is alſo wholly varied. So that upon the matter, all the propoſitions made by his Majeſty (which did not in terms agree with thoſe preſented to him) are utterly rejected. For, theſe reaſons, his Majeſty deſires that the commitee, now ſent, may ſpeedily have liberty to debate and agree upon the articles of ceſſaation.

Both houſes, perceiving that his Majeſty concealed under thoſe few alterations he had made in their articles more than appeared at firſt ſight, thought proper to tell him, they were not altogether ignorant what advantages he intended to draw from ſuch a ceſſation as he propoſed. To that end, they ſent him in writing their reaſons, why they were obliged to reject his additions to their articles. Here follows the ſubſtance of thoſe reaſons. viz.

The parliament's reaſons, why they cannot agree to Charles's propoſed articles. March 27. Ruſhworth. Vol. V. p. 182. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 148.

" 1. That if they ſhould grant ſuch a free trade " as your Majeſty deſireth, to Oxford, and other " places where your forces remain, it would be " very difficult, if not impoſſible, to keep arms, " ammunition, money and bullion from paſſing " into your Majeſty's army, without very ſtrict " and frequent ſearches, which would make it " ſo troubleſome, chargeable and dangerous to the " ſubjects, that the queſtion being but for twenty " days for ſo few places, the miſchiefs and incon- " veniencies to the whole kingdom would be far " greater than any advantage which that ſmall " number of your ſubjects (whom it concerns) can " have by it.

" The caſe then is much otherwiſe than is ex- " preſſed by your Majeſty's anſwer; for whereas " they are charged not to give the leaſt permiſ- " ſion of this liberty and freedom of trade, during " the ceſſation, the truth is, that they do grant " it as fully to the benefit of the ſubjects, even " in time of war; and that your Majeſty, in preſ- " ſing this for the peoples good, doth therein " deſire that which will be very little beneficial " to the ſubject, but exceedingly advantageous to " your Majeſty, in ſupplying your army with " many neceſſaries, and making your quarters a " ſtaple for ſuch commodities as may be vented " in the adjacent counties, and ſo draw money " thither; whereby the inhabitants will be better " inabled, by loans and contributions, to ſupport " your Majeſty's army. And as your Majeſty's " army may receive much advantage, and the " other army much danger, if ſuch freedom ſhould " be granted to thoſe places, ſo there is no pro- " bability that the army raiſed by the lords and " commons ſhall have thence any ſuch return of " commodities and other ſupplies as may be uſeful " for them: and they conceive that, in a treaty " for a ceſſation, thoſe demands cannot be thought " reaſonable which are not indifferent, that is, " equally advantageous to both parties.

" As they have given no interruption to the trade " of the kingdom, but in relation to the ſupply of " the contrary army, which the reaſon of war re- " quires; ſo they beſeech your Majeſty to conſi- " der, whether your ſoldiers have not robbed the " carriers in ſeveral parts, where there hath been " ſuch reaſon; and your ſhips taken many veſſels, " to the great damage not only of particular " merchants, but of the whole kingdom: and " whether your Majeſty hath not declared your own " purpoſe, and indeavored, by your miniſters of " ſtate, to imbark the merchants goods in foreign " parts, which hath been in ſome meaſure exe- " cuted upon the Eaſt-land merchants in Den- " mark, and is a courſe which will much diminiſh " the wealth of the kingdom; violate the law of " nations; make other Princes arbiters of the diffe- " rence between your Majeſty and your people; " break off the intercourſe between this and other " ſtates, and be like to bring us into quarrels and " diſſenſion with all the neighboring nations.

Charles I An' 1643.

" 2. To demand approving of commanders of " the ſhips, is to deſire the ſtrength of one party " to the other, before the difference be ended, " and againſt all rules of treaty; to make a ceſ- " ſation at ſea, would leave the kingdom naked " to thoſe foreign forces, which they have great " cauſe to believe have been ſollicited againſt " them, and the ports open for ſuch ſupplies of " arms and ammunition as ſhall be brought from " beyond ſea: but for conveying any number of " forces, by thoſe means, from one port to ano- " ther, they ſhall obſerve the articles of the ceſſa- " tion by which that is reſtrained.

" 3. As for the expreſſions of the army raiſed " by the parliament, they are contented it ſhould " be altered thus '(raiſed by both houſes of par- " liament)' as not deſiring to differ upon words: " but to give any concluſive power, in this caſe, " to the commitee, upon ſuch differences as may " ariſe, wherein the houſes have given no expreſs " direction, is neither ſafe for the commitee to " undertake, nor fit for the two houſes to grant; " yet to debate, and to preſs the reaſon of their " deſires, whereby an agreement from your Ma- " jeſty may be procured, is granted to them: " and altho' the two houſes did think it moſt " proper the ceſſation ſhould be firſt agreed on, " and that it was unfit to treat in blood; yet, to " ſatisfy the world of their earneſt longing after " peace, they have given power to the commitee " to enter into the treaty upon the two firſt pro- " poſitions, notwithſtanding the ceſſation be not " yet aſſented to, and thoſe being agreed, they " hope the foundation will be laid not only of a " ſuſpenſion, but a total abolition of all hoſtility " in the kingdom.

" 4. If the nature of war be duly conſidered, it " muſt needs be acknowledged, that it is incom- " patible with the ordinary rules of a peaceable " government. Your Majeſty would have them " commit none, but according to the known laws " of the land; whereby they conceive your Ma- " jeſty underſtands, that it muſt be by the ordinary " proceſs of law: which being granted, it will " follow, that no man muſt be commited by them " for ſupplying your Majeſty with arms, powder, " or ammunition. For, by the law of this land, " the ſubject may carry ſuch goods from London, " or any other place, to Oxford, the ſoldiers muſt " not be commited if they run from their colors, " and refuſe any duty in the army; 'No man " ſhall be commited for not ſubmiting to neceſ- " ſary ſupplies of money:' ſo that, if this be " yielded in your Majeſty's ſenſe, they ſhall be " diſabled to reſtrain ſupplies from their enemies, " and to govern or maintain their own ſoldiers.

" It

Charles I An' 1643.

" It cannot be thought reaſonable that, under the " diſguiſe of a ceſſation, they ſhould admit that " which will neceſſarily produce the diſſolving " their army, and deſtruction of the cauſe.

" It ſeems not probable that your Majeſty " intends that, if any be taken with ſupplies for " this army, or mutinying in your own, ſuch " perſons ſhall not be commited, but according " to the known laws of the land, that is, by " proceſs of law; but rather, that your Majeſty " will ſo interpret this limitation of known laws, " that tho' it lays ſtrait bonds upon both houſes, " yet it leaves your generals as much liberty as " before: for it hath been denied by your Ma- " jeſty, that theſe known laws give any power " to the two houſes of parliament to raiſe arms, " and ſo conſequently their general cannot exer- " ciſe any martial law in thoſe caſes; and it is " not unlikely, it will be affirmed, that the generals " conſtituted by your Majeſty's commiſſion have " that power, by the ſame known laws; ſo that " this article, under the ſpecious ſhew of liberty " and law, would altogether diſable them to de- " fend their liberties and laws, and would pro- " duce to your Majeſty an abſolute victory " and ſubmiſſion, under pretenſe of a ceſſation and " treaty.

" 5. Being, by neceſſity inevitable on their part " inforced to a defenſive war, in this unhappy " breach between your Majeſty and them, and " that they are therein warranted both by the " laws of God and man, it muſt needs follow " that, by the ſame laws, they are inabled to " raiſe means to ſupport that war: and there- " fore, 'till it ſhall pleaſe God to incline your " Majeſty to afford them ſuch a peace as may " ſecure them, they cannot relinquiſh the power " of laying taxes upon thoſe who ought to join " with them in that defenſe, and the neceſſary " ways of levying thoſe taxes upon them, in " caſe of refuſal; for otherwiſe their army muſt " needs be diſſolved. But if your Majeſty ſhall " conſent to diſband the armies, the cauſe of " war being taken away, the conſequences will " likewiſe be removed, and the ſubject reſtored " to the benefit of thoſe laws, which the neceſſity " of arms hath, in ſuch caſes, ſuſpended.

As for the clauſe left out in the third " article, it implied a freedom of paſſage and " communication of quarters, which is contrary " to the nature of a ceſſation, whereby matters " ſhould be preſerved in the ſtate they are, and " neither party have liberty ſo much to advan- " tage himſelf, as it is evident your Majeſty might " do, if your forces in the North and Weſt might " join with thoſe at Oxford, and bring thither " thoſe ſupplies of treaſure or arms which were " brought out of Holland; or, at leaſt, it ſhould " be ſo indifferent as to give a proportionable " advantage to the other ſide, which this doth " not. Charles I An' 1643.

" For the reaſons already alleged, they cannot " agree to the alterations and inlargements of " the ceſſation propounded, or to transfer to the " commitee any ſuch power of treating, debating " and agreeing upon thoſe articles, in any other " manner than the houſe have directed. But, that " a fair and ſpeedy paſſage may be opened to a " ſecure and happy peace, they have inabled their " commitee to treat and debate upon the two " propoſitions concerning his Majeſty's own reve- " nue, the delivery of his towns, caſtles, maga- " zines and ſhips, and the diſbanding the armies; " which being agreed upon, a preſent peace and " ſecurity will follow, and the treaty upon the other " propoſitions be facilitated, without fear of inter- " ruption, by the confuſion of war, or exaſpera- " tion of either party by the bloody effects there- " of."

King Charles failed not anſwering this paper. But, as his ſaid replication is very prolix, I ſhall content myſelf with inſerting the moſt material part of each article.

1. Concerning the freedom of trade:

His Majeſty denies that he has any private benefit by it; and aſſures, that the good of his people is the only advantage he has in view. He ſlightly paſſes over the objection, that the ceſſation being to laſt only twenty days, the freedom of commerce could not be, for ſo ſhort a ſpace, of any great benefit to the nation. Charles's reply. April 4. Ruſhworth, Vol V. p. 186, &c.

His Majeſty affirms, that no complaint concerning his ſoldiers pillaging carriers has been made him, which he has not received to the relief and reparation of the ſufferers.

He owns, he is reſolved not to grant his protection to ſuch perſons abroad who aſſiſt, or conſent to actions of diſloyalty to him at home.

2. Concerning the ſhips.

He ſays, as the equiping out the preſent fleet is pretended to be for defenſe of his dominions, it is moſt neceſſary for his Majeſty both to know the deſigns, and to approve the commanders. He cannot ſee how a ceſſation at ſea ſhould leave the kingdom naked to foreign forces; and is willing to concur in the reſiſtance of all ſuch, of what kind ſoever, and expects that, during the ceſſation, the conveying of all forces from one part to another, by ſea, for the earl of Eſſex's aſſiſtance, be reſtrained, whereto both houſes ſeem now to conſent, tho' it be not at all expreſſed in their former articles.

3. Concerning the power of the commitee.

His Majeſty had, and hath great reaſon to deſire, that the commitee may have liberty to debate and conclude any differences and expreſſions in the articles, in order to prevent loſs of time. Of this there is a clear evidence, in the conſent which his Majeſty now underſtands to be given by both houſes, that no forces ſhall, during the ceſſation, be ſent by ſea for the relief of any places held by them; which clauſe might in much leſs time have been agreed here, had there been that liberty. And much time muſt ſtill be loſt, as the commitee have not power to explain the meaning of both houſes concerning communication of quarters.

4. Concerning impriſonment.

It was no part of his Majeſty's intention, that his article againſt impriſonment of his ſubjects, otherwiſe than according to the known laws of this land, land, ſhould extend to the deſtruction of the military diſcipline of either army. This is an inſtance of the neceſſity of inabling ſome perſons to conclude upon theſe articles, ſince a limitation of half a dozen words would have ſaved moſt of this fourth reaſon.

Charles I An' 1643.

5. Concerning taxes.

The King ſtrongly inſiſts on the two houſes not having a legal power to impoſe taxes without his conſent: and adds, he is extremely well pleaſed to find they have need of force and rapine to raiſe them. He ſays he has reaſon to inſiſt, that no ſuch violence be uſed towards his ſubjects, for not ſubmiting to illegal impoſitions; being willing to be obliged from the like courſe, and to rely wholly upon the juſtice of his cauſe, and the affection of his people.

6. Concerning communication of quarters.

His Majeſty's anſwer upon this article was very general and obſcure. He ſays, it highly concerns him, that this and every other clauſe be ſo clear, that no after-differences may ariſe upon any diſputable point; ſince they, whoſe induſtry and malice could perſuade any of his people, that, in the buſineſs of Brentford, he had broken a ceſſation before any was made or offered, would have a much eaſier work to lay the breach of a made ceſſation to his charge, if the ground of this breach would bear the leaſt diſpute. He agrees that, in a ceſſation, the advantages ſhould be equal; but from this principle draws the inference, That therefore ſir Ralph Hopton, and the earl of Newcaſtle, ought to have the ſame liberty to come to him, as the earl of Stamford, and lord Fairfax, had to come to the earl of Eſſex (1).

Remark (1) This advantage not accruing to both houſes by the ceſſation, ſince they had it before, King Charles could not lay any claim thereto by virtue of the ſuſpenſion.

He concluded his anſwer with ſaying, "Notwithſtanding all this, his Majeſty, to ſhew his abundant deſire of peace, is contented to admit a ceſſation upon the matter of their own articles, ſo that his Majeſty may not be underſtood to conſent to any impoſing upon his ſubjects, or impriſoning them, to force them to contribute; ſo that there may not be a liberty for any rapine, plundering, or ſeizing upon his ſubjects, by the parliament's ſoldiers, for not ſubmiting to ſuch illegal impoſitions; for otherwiſe both houſes may, during the ceſſation, impoſe new taxes, not only to the nineteenth part, but, if they pleaſe, to the half of, or all their eſtates; and their army would then be at leiſure to be imployed as collectors as well of the old as the new impoſitions, and vaſt ſums would and might by this means be raiſed, to their own extraordinary advantage, and great diſadvantage of his Majeſty, who can neither obtain his own conſent to take the like courſes, nor, in caſe he could, is he ſo quartered as to have within the power of his army any ſuch city as London, or ſo many and rich counties as they have to retire to on ſuch occaſions."

The parliament refuſe longer treating about the ceſſation. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 101.

Both houſes, having examined Charles's reply, ſent their commitee new inſtructions, wherein they ſaid, "His Majeſty's expreſſions, in his anſwer, were ſo doubtful, that they did not think good to conſume any more time in debates upon the ceſſation, and the rather, as the remainder of the whole time for the treaty was but ſeven days, and if the ceſſation was preſently agreed, it would not yield any conſiderable advantage to the kingdom. Wherefore they ſhould deſire his Majeſty, to give a ſpeedy and poſitive anſwer to their firſt propoſition concerning the diſbanding, that ſo the people might not have the ſhadow, but the ſubſtance of peace."

Charles I An' 1643.

Theſe inſtructions being imparted to Charles, he indeavored, in the anſwer he returned, to ſhew it was not his fault that a ceſſation from hoſtilities had not been concluded. He preſſed again, that whatever was thought doubtful in the articles might be expounded, whatever was excepted againſt might be debated, a ceſſation concluded, and power given to the commitee to that effect. p. 192.

This is all was tranſacted touching the ſuſpenſion of arms propoſed by King Charles, and whereby, ſeemingly, he had hoped to reap great advantages, had the two houſes being leſs upon their guard. As the conferences on a pacification were not to commence 'till the twenty-fifth of March, whatever was done before that day, concerning the ceſſation, is to be conſidered rather as a preparative, than as part of the conferences, tho' the negociation relating to a ſuſpenſion was continued 'till the ſeventh of April.

Negociation upon the other propoſitions.

I muſt now touch on the eſſential part of the treaty, with regard to the terms offered on both ſides for a peace. As it was agreed to begin with the diſcuſſion of the two firſt reſpective propoſitions, his Majeſty's firſt was immediately conſidered. The propoſition was, That his revenue, magazines, towns, ſhips and forts, ſhould be reſtored. I ſhall cite the chief arguments advanced upon each of theſe heads.

p. 196, &c. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 167.

March the twenty-ſixth, the commiſſioners preſented to his Majeſty a memorial, urging:

"That the two houſes of parliament had not made uſe of his Majeſty's own revenue, but in a very ſmall proportion, which for a good part had been imployed in the maintenance of his Majeſty's children, according to the allowance eſtabliſhed by himſelf: that they would ſatisfy what ſhould remain due to his Majeſty, of thoſe ſums received out of his own revenue; and would leave the ſame to his Majeſty for the time to come. But they likewiſe propoſed, That he would reſtore what had been taken for his uſe, upon any of the bills aſſigned to other purpoſes, by ſeveral acts of parliament, or out of the proviſion made for the war of Ireland."

The King's anſwer.

"That he was well contented to allow whatſoever had been imployed in the maintenance of his children, and to receive the arrears due to himſelf, and to be ſure of his own for the future.

"That he was willing to reſtore all monies taken for his uſe, by any authority from him, upon any bills aſſigned to other purpoſes, being aſſured he had received very little or nothing that way.

"But he expected ſatisfaction for all thoſe ſeveral ſums, received and diverted to other purpoſes, by orders of one or both houſes, which ought to have been paid upon the act of pacification with Scotland, or imployed for the diſcharge of the debts of the kingdom, and by other acts of parliament for the relief of his Proteſtant ſubjects of Ireland."

Next day, the commiſſioners deſired to know of his Majeſty, if he would not account his own revenue to be ſure for the future, if both houſes of parliament did leave it in the ſame way as it was before the troubles commenced.

Charles replied; "That by thoſe words ('of being ſure of his own for the future') he meaned, that no reſtraints or interruption ſhould be made, by one or both houſes, in and upon his Ma-

CHARLES I An' 1643.

" jesty's revenue, but that it shou'd be left in " the same way it was before the troubles began."

One may readily perceive that there were not any difficulties upon this article capable of preventing a pacification.

Concerning the magazines.

The parliament's commissioners offered, in writing; " That all the arms and ammunition, taken " out of his Majesty's magazines, shou'd be deli- " vered into his stores, and whatsoever shou'd be " wanting, they would in convenient time supply, " in kind. But they likewise propos'd; That the " persons to whose charge those public magazines " shou'd be commited, being nominated by his " Majesty, might be such as the two houses of par- " liament could confide in: and that he would " restore all such arms and ammunition as had " been taken, for his use, from the several coun- " ties, cities and towns.

The King's answer.

" The magazines shall be commited to, and " continued in the custody of the sworn officers, " to whose places the same belong: and if any the " said officers shall forfeit that trust, by any mis- " demeanors, his Majesty will by no means defend " them from the justice of the law.

" His Majesty will restore again, and recompense " out of his own stores, such arms and ammunition " as have been taken for his use out of the several " counties, &c.

" He expects, that the arms and ammunition " which have been taken from the several counties " and cities, for the use of the armies under com- " mand of the earl of Essex, be likewise restored " to them."

Without entering into a more particular discussion of this article, it suffices to say, that the whole difficulty lay in both houses reserving to themselves the power of approving such as should be intrusted with the custody of the magazines; and in King Charles, pretending, that the legal oath of such persons was a sufficient security. And this rendered its conclusion utterly impracticable.

Concerning restitution of the towns and forts.

The same difficulty occured upon this article. The two houses offered to restore the towns and forts, but pretended, that they should be delivered into the hands of such persons as both houses could confide in; whereto Charles would not agree. As the commissioners urged the necessity of giving the people satisfaction, with respect to their fears and jealousies; the King answered, That he rather expected, their reasons should have had some foundation in the law of the land, than that they should only have insisted upon fears and jealousies, of which, as he did not know the ground, so was he ignorant of the cure.

Concerning the ships.

It was the same with this as with the two foregoing articles. Both houses required, that the lord high-admiral, and all commanders of ships, should take a particular oath, to use their utmost power to preserve the true Protestant religion, and the kingdom's peace, against all foreign forces, and all other forces raised without his Majesty's authority, and consent of both houses of parliament. But hereto Charles would not consent, alleging the oaths which all those officers were, by law, already obliged to take, were very sufficient: only he said, if any thing should be made appear to him necessary to be added, when there should be a full and peaceable convention of parliament, he would readily consent to an act for such addition.

If it is considered what was the occasion of this war, it will easily be perceived, that the execution, and not the injunction of the laws was the question. Wherefore King Charles, in pretending that every thing should be setled by law, did not any how meddle with the question to be decided in his dispute with the parliament.

CHARLES I An' 1643.

His Majesty's first proposition having been thus in vain debated, they proceeded to the first of the parliament's, which contained two articles; viz. that both armies should be disbanded, and his Majesty should return to his parliament. Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 206.

Charles's answer to the first was, " That he was " willing all armies should be disbanded, and con- " ceived the best way to it to be a speedy conclu- " sion of the treaty; and for that purpose he de- " sired, that the time given to the commitee of " both houses to treat might be inlarged."

As to the second, " He would repair to his par- " liament, as soon as he could possibly do it with " his honor and safety."

As the King's answer was too general and doubtful, the commissioners, in writing, desired to know, " If by the words ('a speedy conclusion of the " treaty') he intended a conclusion of the treaty on " his first proposition, and their proposition for " disbanding the armies; or a conclusion of the " treaty on all the propositions of both parts."

His Majesty replied; " That, by a speedy con- " clusion of the treaty, he intended such a conclu- " sion of the treaty, as there might be a clear evi- " dence to himself and his subjects of a future " peace, and no ground left for the continuance and " growth of the present bloody dissensions; which, " he doubted not might he obtained, if both houses " should consent, that the treaty might proceed " without farther interruption, or limitation of days."

This reply being no less ambiguous than the former, the commissioners insisted upon an explication of what they had already desired; as also that he would be pleased to let them know, what he intended should be a clear evidence to him and his subjects of a future peace.

Charles answered, " That if the conclusion of the " treaty on his first proposition, and the propositions " of both houses, should be so full and perfectly made, " that the law of the land might have a full, free " and uninterrupted course for the defense and pre- " servation of the rights of his Majesty, both houses, " and his subjects, there would be thence a clear " evidence of a future peace, and this would be such " a conclusionas he intended. He never meaned, " that both armies should remain undisbanded until " all the propositions of both sides were fully con- " cluded: but he was very sorry that, in that point " of the proposition of both houses, viz. his return to " the parliament, they had yet no manner of power " or instructions so much as to treat with him."

His Majesty used such general expressions, that it was easy to discover he sought only to prolong the conferences, or to make some advantage of the commissioners answers. To all appearance, he would also have found a fresh occasion of delay, in the debate of that part of the proposition concerning his return to the parliament.

April the tenth, the commissioners presented to his Majesty another paper, wherein they said, " That, by new instructions, they were commanded " to insist upon the disbanding of the two armies, " and that both houses conceived his answer to be " in effect a denial, unless they departed from all " those cautions and limitations contained in their " reply to his first proposition: that if they had " not inserted their desire of his Majesty's return, " in their commitee's instructions, it was because " they conceived disbanding the armies would faci- " litate his resolution therein."

During

CHARLES I AN' 1643.

During the courſe of this negociation, Charles had frequent conferences in private with the commiſſioners. Whitelock, in his Memorials, reports that, in one of theſe conferences, the commiſſioners (of whom he was one) having been with the King 'till mid-night, and preſſed him with their reaſons upon a very material point, his Majeſty was prevailed with to give a ſatisfactory anſwer, which would have much conduced to a happy ſucceſs of the treaty, and told them, "He was fully ſatisfied, "and promiſed to let them have his anſwer in "writing according to their deſire;" but becauſe it was then too late to draw it up, he ordered them to wait on him next morning at ſuch a time. Accordingly they came; but, inſtead of that anſwer, which they expected, the King gave them a paper quite contrary to what was concluded the night before, and very much tending to a breach of the treaty. Whitelock ſays, he was informed by ſome of the King's own friends that, after the commiſſioners were gone from his Majeſty, and his council alſo withdrawn, ſome of his bed-chamber (and they went higher) hearing from himſelf what anſwer he had promiſed, and doubting it would tend to ſuch iſſue as they did not wiſh, they being rather for the continuance of the war, never left perſuading the King, 'till they prevailed with him to change his former reſolutions, and give order for his anſwer to be drawn directly contrary to what he had promiſed; it being that Prince's misfortune to prefer always the opinions of others to his own. Which is an obſervation confirmed alſo by lord Clarendon, in his character of King Charles I. Indeed Whitelock does not ſay, that the King's anſwer, which he mentions, was the ſame with the inſuing meſſage; but in all probability it was ſo, ſince it was the cauſe of breaking off the conferences. Howſoever this be, on the twelfth of April, Charles, notwithſtanding the indeavors of the commiſſioners to diſſuade him, ſent to both houſes this meſſage: viz.

A remarkable circumſtance. Whitelock, p. 68.

Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 259. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 173.

"AS ſoon as his Majeſty is ſatisfied concerning "his own revenue, magazines, ſhips and "ports, to which he deſires nothing but that the "juſt, known, legal rights of his Majeſty (de-"volved to him from his progenitors) and of the "perſons truſted by him, which have violently "been taken from both, be reſtored unto him, "and unto them.

"As ſoon as all the members of both houſes "ſhall be reſtored to the ſame capacity, of ſiting "and voting in parliament, as they had upon the "firſt of January 1641, the ſame juſtly belong-"ing unto them by their birth-rights, and the free "elections of thoſe who ſent them, and from "which they have been voted for adhering to "his Majeſty in theſe diſtractions; his Ma-"jeſty not intending that this ſhould extend either "to the biſhops, whoſe votes have been taken "away by bill; or to ſuch in whoſe places, upon "new writs, new elections have been made.

"As ſoon as his Majeſty and both houſes may "be ſecured from ſuch tumultuous aſſemblies as, "to the great breach of privileges, and the high "diſhonor of parliaments, formerly aſſembled "about both houſes, and awed the members of "the ſame, and occaſioned two ſeveral complaints "from the houſe of lords, and two ſeveral deſires "of that houſe to the houſe of commons to join "in a declaration againſt them; the complying "with which deſire might have prevented all "theſe miſerable diſtractions which have inſued. "Which ſecurity, his Majeſty conceives, can be "only ſetled by adjourning the parliament to ſome "other place, at leaſt twenty miles from London, "the choice of which his Majeſty leaves to both "houſes.

CHARLES I AN' 1643.

"His Majeſty will then moſt chearfully and "readily conſent, that both armies be immedi-"ately diſbanded, and give a preſent meeting to "both his houſes of parliament, at the ſame time "and place to which the parliament ſhall agree "to be adjourned.

"His Majeſty being confident, that the law "will then recover its due credit and eſtimation, "and that upon a free debate, in a full and peace-"able convention of parliament, ſuch proviſions will "be made with regared to ſeditious preachings and "printing againſt his Majeſty, and the eſtabliſhed "laws (which hath been one of the chief cauſes of "the preſent diſtractions) and ſuch care will be "taken concerning the legal and known rights "of his Majeſty, and the property and liberty "of his ſubjects, that whatſoever hath been pub-"liſhed or done, in or by color of any illegal de-"clarations, ordinances, or order of one or both "houſes, or any commitee of either of them, and "particularly the power to raiſe arms without his "Majeſty's conſent, will be in ſuch manner re-"called, diſclaimed and provided againſt, that "no ſeed will remain for the like to ſpring out for "the future, to diſturb the peace of the kingdom, "and to indanger its very being.

There needed not much penetration to perceive, by this meſſage, that not only the King intended to break off the conferences, but alſo was not much inclined to peace. It was indeed very needleſs to enter into treaty, ſince neither King nor parliament would recede from their pretenſions. The ſhorteſt way would have been to diſcuſs the general queſtion, "Whether there was juſt reaſon to con-"fide in the King, and reſtore him to his rights?" For every one of the propoſitions offered by both parties neceſſarily led to that queſtion; ſo that none could be decided without this being previouſly determined. Had all the other propoſitions been diſcuſſed, the difficulties would have been ſtill greater, ſince the parties builded upon quite oppoſite principles. But, in all appearance, both King and parliament had foreſeen what came to paſs, and agreed to this negociation only to make people believe they were peaceably diſpoſed. This was equally neceſſary for them, becauſe in the people conſiſted the ſtrength of both parties.

As ſoon as both houſes received this meſſage, they ſent their commiſſioners poſitive orders to return, and the conferences ceaſed.

The conferences broken off.

It was not without reaſon that Charles deſired a ceſſation from hoſtilities, on the terms by him propoſed, tho' for even the ſhorteſt ſpace of time, and that he inſiſted upon communication of quarters. He found himſelf at Oxford unprovided of ammunition, and the Queen, who was at York, had brought him a good quantity; but the difficulty was the conveying it to Oxford with a ſufficient guard. If therefore the ceſſation of arms had been concluded, with the clauſe of communication of quarters, nothing would have obſtructed his ſending for the ammunition from York, without the parliament's having room for complaint. For tho', in the firſt article of the propoſed ceſſation, it was allowed to ſtop all perſons carrying ammunition, yet it was not ſaid that ſuch conveying was a breach of the ſuſpenſion. Since therefore, by the article of communication of quarters, King Charles might have drawn as many of his troops as he pleaſed from York to Oxford, he might likewiſe, had this article been granted, have ſent for his ammunition with a guard, which the parliament's forces could could not have attacked, without violating the truce, when the convoy ſhould have paſſed into their quarters.

He detaches Prince Rupert to ſetle a communication between York and Oxford. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 180.

It evidently appears, that Charles deſigned to reap this advantage by the ceſſation, which, according to him, was to be only for his peoples eaſe and benefit, ſince from the begining of April, when the treaty was negociating at Oxford, he detached Prince Rupert with twelve hundred horſe, and ſeven or eight hundred foot, to eſtabliſh a communication between York and Oxford, by ſecuring certain places between theſe two cities. The Prince marched by Birmingham, a town of the parliament's, gariſoned with a company of foot (1), and taking it by ſtorm, made the inhabitants pay a large fine, to chaſtiſe them for aſſiſting the gariſon to repulſe him (2).

That Prince takes Birmingham, and Litchfield. p. 182.

After this ſmall conqueſt, his ſaid Highneſs marched directly to Litchfield, where he entered without difficulty, the town being open in ſeveral places: but the cathedral, with the cloſe, was a ſort of fortreſs, which he was obliged to beſiege in form, being ſtrongly gariſoned. At length, he drained the moat, and ſprang two mines, whereof one taking effect, he furiouſly ſtormed the place, which was ſtoutly defended by the gariſon: but the dread of not being able to ſtand a ſecond aſſault, made them deſire to capitulate. Rupert granted them honorable terms; being very glad to be freed from the trouble of continuing the ſiege, which had laſted ten days. He intended to puſh his conqueſts farther northwards, in order to make a line of communication between York and Oxford: but the King recalled him from Litchfield, wanting him to raiſe the ſiege of Reading.

He is recalled by his Majeſty.

Siege and taking of Reading by Eſſex. p. 177. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 265, 266, 267.

The treaty at Oxford being broken off, the fifteenth of April, the earl of Eſſex marched that day from Windſor, and on the morrow appeared before Reading. His army conſiſted of ſixteen thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe: the gariſon was three hundred horſe, and three thouſand foot. His Majeſty was ſo poſſeſſed with the notion, that the parliament's ſoldiers ſerved them unwillingly, and by conſtraint, that he iſſued a proclamation, offering pardon to ſuch as were in Eſſex's army; a precaution abſolutely fruitleſs. At the begining of that ſiege, the governor, ſir Arthur Aſton, being wounded in the head, and forced to keep his chamber, the command devolved to colonel Richard Fielding, eldeſt colonel in the gariſon.

Clarendon, Vol, II. p. 179.

Charles no ſooner heard of the ſiege of Reading, but he detached away a body of cavalry, under the conduct of commiſſary Wilmot, who found means to throw into the town five hundred men, with ſome powder. But this ſupply not appearing ſufficient to colonel Fielding, he demanded to capitulate, and a truce was agreed on, during which the beſiegers and beſieged mutually gave hoſtages.

Charles tries in vain to relieve that town. p. 183.

At the ſame time Charles, coming with his army within few miles of Reading, detached his general Ruthen, newly created earl of Forth, who, with a thouſand muſqueteers, vigorouſly attacked a poſt (3), by which the King was neceſſarily to paſs in order to relieve Reading. The earl of Forth was in hopes that, while he attacked this poſt, the gariſon would ſally upon the beſiegers. But as, without knowing it, he had made his attack juſt as the truce was agreed on, there was no ſally from the town: ſo not being able to force the paſs, he retreated to his Majeſty.

Mean while Fielding, having negociated a capitulation with the earl of Eſſex, found means, before it was intirely concluded, to go in the night to Charles, telling him, he hoped to have liberty to march away with their arms and baggage. His Majeſty approved the capitulation, which was ſigned next day, and the town ſurrendered to the beſiegers: but, by one of the articles, which ſeemingly Fielding did not tell the King, and which perhaps was not yet agreed on, Eſſex excepted the deſerters, who could not obtain liberty to march out with the others. As Charles's troops evacuated the town, and were paſſing thro' the enemies guards, the ſoldiers were inſulted, and ſome waggons plundered, contrary to the articles of the capitulation.

Fielding capitulates. April 26.

Breach of the capitulation. p. 184. Ruſhworth. Vol. V. p. 267.

The King was highly pleaſed with ſaving the gariſon of Reading, and indeed that was his chief view in permiting Fielding to capitulate. But when the gariſon came to Oxford, ſeveral officers complained, that Fielding was too haſty in ſurrendering a place which could have held out much longer; nay, ſome openly charged him with treachery: whereupon he deſired to be tried by a council of war, which was granted him. Charles, who perhaps had too readily conſented to the capitulation, and was inſenſed at him, when he underſtood the place was capable of making a longer defenſe, could not however find fault with his capitulating, ſince it was done with his approbation: but his admiting that article whereby the deſerters were excepted was charged to him as a crime, and the King publiſhed a declaration, proteſting he had not conſented to that exception, being very far from refuſing protection to any who ſhould leave the enemy, and betake themſelves to his ſervice. Fielding was alſo accuſed of not paying punctual obedience to his Majeſty's orders: but what theſe orders were, I have not been able to inform myſelf. Howſoever this be, Fielding was ſentenced by the council of war to loſe his head: which ſentence, after long interceſſion, was remited by the King; but his regiment was given to another. Poſſibly, he had been too precipitate in concluding the capitulation, and had not fully acquainted his Majeſty with the true ſtate of the place: but, as he could not be condemned for that, ſince he had the King's conſent to capitulate, other pretenſes were ſought. This ſentence occaſioned great diſſenſion in Charles's army; ſome indeavoring to vindicate it, while others paſſionately repreſented it as the moſt unjuſt had ever been paſſed in a like caſe.

Lord Clarendon ſays, that his Majeſty, having received wrong intelligence, that the earl of Eſſex, after reducing Reading, was marching directly to Oxford, reſolved to retire into the North, to join the earl of Newcaſtle. But it was only a falſe alarm: Eſſex was ſo little able to beſiege Oxford, that contrariwiſe he was forced to remain ſix weeks at Reading, without being able to act, by reaſon of the ſickneſs which infeſted his army.

without confuſion, be ſpoken of according to the order of time: and therefore I chuſe rather to follow the order of place, and touch firſt on what paſſed in the middle of the kingdom, where lay the two main armies. I ſhall relate next the principal events which occured in the Weſt; and laſtly, ſhall proceed to what paſſed in the North, and on the borders of the Eaſtern counties. Theſe latter being aſſociated by the parliament, and well provided with troops, the King had not many opportunities to carry the war thither. As for the Southern counties, nothing conſiderable was tranſacted there during this campain. After this, I ſhall reſume what paſſed, of any moment, with regard to civil affairs, during the courſe of the year 1643. This method has alſo its inconveniencies: but I ſhall indeavor to avoid them in part, by marking the exact time of each event, that the cauſes and motives as well of the civil, as military actions may more readily appear.

The parliament have thoughts of attacking Oxford. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 201.

The reduction of Reading ſeemed to the parliament a favorable omen for this campain. But, as I hinted, the great mortality among Eſſex's ſoldiers, ſuffered him not to improve this advantage. After Reading had ſurrendered, both houſes thought of no leſs than beſieging Oxford, where the King was in great diſtreſs for want of warlike ſtores. Very ſeemingly, the intelligence he had received, that the earl of Eſſex was upon marching thither, came from ſome friends at London, who, knowing it was the parliament's deſign, queſtioned not its being put in execution. Mean while, Charles received ſome ammunition in May; and, as his enemies were not in condition to make any attempt, he remained quiet at Oxford.

Eſſex marches towards Oxford. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 290.

Finally, after a ſix weeks ſtay at Reading, the earl of Eſſex marched for Oxford, rather thro' condeſcenſion to the parliament, than in expectation of making any progreſs, by reaſon of the ill ſtate of his army. He however advanced to Thame, within ten miles of Oxford, where he halted (1).

Col. Hurry deſerts, and gives Prince Rupert important intelligence; who beats up two of the enemies quarters, and retires. June 18. p. 274. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 201, 202. 203.

There was in his army a Scotiſh colonel, named Hurry, who had ſerved in Germany with the earl of Forth, Charles's general, with whom he held a ſecret correſpondence. As ſoon as the earl of Eſſex approached Oxford, Hurry quited the parliament's ſervice, and went over to the King, who received him very graciouſly. Then he informed Prince Rupert of the ſituation of the quarters of the parliament's army, and perſuaded him to make an attempt upon the enemy. His Highneſs, departing Oxford in the evening with a body of cavalry, took a long circuit, and at day-break came to Wickham, where beating up the quarters of two regiments, one of horſe, the other of foot, he cut them in pieces. Then he attacked another quarter with like ſucceſs, after which he reſolved to retire by a bridge, where he had left a guard. But Eſſex having now taken the alarm, had detached ſome troops to intercept the Prince, who was to croſs Chaldgrave field, and enter a lane which led to that bridge. Eſſex's cavalry not giving Prince Rupert time to reach the bridge, he choſe rather to expect them in an open field, than enter the lane with the enemies in his rear. He charged therefore theſe horſe with ſuch bravery, that he put them to flight towards a body of foot, which Eſſex himſelf was leading. While the cavalry fled, Rupert paſſed the lane and bridge, and entered Oxford in triumph (2). On the firſt alarm at the head-quarters, mr. Hambden, colonel of foot, mounted his horſe, and rode as a voluntier in the regiment detached to intercept his Highneſs. He was ſhot in the ſhoulder in this action, and within few days died of the wound. He was a perſon very eminent in his party, both for his courage as an officer in the army, and for his wiſdom and capacity as a member of parliament. He had given a good proof of his firmneſs in his famous trial concerning ſhip-money.

After this loſs, the earl of Eſſex, whoſe army was in a very indifferent condition, did not think fit to ſtay any longer at Thame. He put his troops into quarters of refreſhment at St. Albans, Uxbridge, and thoſe neighborhoods, 'till they ſhould be recruited, and furniſhed with diverſe neceſſaries they wanted, which the parliament, whether from inability, or ſome other reaſon, ſeemed not much to regard.

Thenceforwards Charles's military affairs began to flouriſh, and the parliament was extremely imbaraſſed. On the thirteenth of July, her Majeſty joined him, bringing two thouſand foot, a thouſand horſe, a hundred waggons laden with ammunition of all ſorts, ſix pieces of cannon, and two mortars. On the other ſide, ſir William Waller, ſent by the parliament weſtward, had the ill fortune to be defeated, and his army ſo diſperſed, that it was no longer ſerviceable (3). In this juncture it was that the King reſolved to beſiege Briſtol, by Prince Rupert, with whom was joined the Corniſh army which had routed ſir William Waller.

On the morrow, his Highneſs holding a council of war, it was reſolved to proceed by aſſault, and not by approach. The walls muſt have been very weak, otherwiſe it cannot eaſily be conceived the beſiegers ſhould reſolve to ſtorm two days after their arrival, eſpecially as there was a numerous gariſon in the city (4). Howſoever this be, next day both armies attacked, each at three different places, ſo that the gariſon were forced to divide themſelves into ſix bodies to defend the walls. The Corniſh army was repulſed with great ſlaughter in their three aſſaults. The two diviſions of Prince Rupert's were likewiſe repulſed: but the third, conducted by colonel Waſhington, had better ſucceſs, the colonel finding means to make a breach in the wall large enough for the Prince to enter with his cavalry. But this advantage only put him in poſſeſſion of the ſuburbs, beyond which was the city-wall, much ſtronger than what he had paſſed. However, he marched up the ſtreet to Frome-gate, where he was forced to halt, and where he loſt many of his men, who were ſhot by the inhabitants from the walls and windows (5).

loſt his preſenſe of mind, and ordered a parley to be beaten. This governor was colonel Nathaniel Fiennes, who, at the begining of this parliament, had made in the houſe of commons diverſe ſmart and elegant ſpeeches againſt the King, but who, in all appearance, was not very ſkilful in the art of war. Rupert inſtantly granted the deſired capitulation, thinking himſelf very happy to gain a place of that importance in ſo ſhort a time. This capitulation was ill obſerved by the King's ſoldiers, who pillaged thoſe of the gariſon, and made themſelves ample amends for the breach of the capitulation at Reading: whether, with or without the general's concurrence is uncertain. Fiennes was impriſoned for his cowardly ſurrender of Briſtol, and ſome months after condemned to die by a council of war: but he was reprieved by the earl of Eſſex, and paſſed the reſidue of his days beyond-ſea.

Fiennes condemned to die. State-Try. Vol. 1.

The reduction of Briſtol inſpiring Charles with freſh hopes, he was willing to improve the preſent opportunity, while the parliament had no army ready to oppoſe his progreſs. He reſolved therefore to beſiege Gloceſter, the poſſeſſion whereof would have been to him of great conſequence. Thereby he would have been maſter of all the Severn, from Briſtol to Shrewſbury, and of the whole country between that river and Wales, where would have remained only Hereford, which probably muſt have ſoon ſurrendered By this means, he would not only have extended his quarters into a very good country, but alſo ſecured a communication from Cornwal to the Northern counties: for as the parliament had no army in the Weſt, ſince Waller's defeat, the communication of the Weſtern counties with Briſtol could not be interrupted. The taking Gloceſter would have opened a communication from Briſtol to Shrewſbury, and thence to the North, by means of Lancaſhire, which was more for him than for the parliament. Beſide this, being poſſeſſed of Gloceſter would have ſecured him the poſſeſſion of Wales, where the parliament would have no entrance but by ſea. If therefore even ſome of his friends have blamed him for undertaking this ſiege, it may be affirmed, the ill ſucceſs was the beſt foundation of their opinion. For my part, I believe he had all imaginable reaſon to undertake it, at a time when there was no likelihood that Eſſex's army could be ready ſoon enough to hinder this conqueſt. Lord Clarendon pretends to diſcover a ſecret, which confirmed Charles in his reſolution. He ſays, his Majeſty having ſent a meſſenger to colonel Maſſy, governor of Gloceſter, to perſuade him to deliver the place, Maſſy in public anſwered in a high ſtile, but in private bid the meſſenger tell the King, "That if he came himſelf to beſiege the town, "he would not hold it againſt him: for it would "not ſtand with his conſcience to fight againſt the "perſon of the King (1)." But the ſequel ſhewed, either that Maſſy had altered his mind, or that Charles had taken a mere compliment for a poſitive promiſe, ſince, in the defenſe of this place, Maſſy was very far from expreſſing the leaſt inclination to favor the King. This Prince was ever poſſeſſed with the notion, that thoſe who bore arms againſt him acted contrary to the dictates of their conſcience, and readily believed, they only wanted opportunity to ſerve him, wherein he was frequently deceived.

CHARLES I An' 1643.

Nothing more clearly ſhews, how advantageous the taking of Gloceſter would have been to his Majeſty, than the parliament's alarm, when they heard the firſt news of his marching to form that ſiege. Whereas before Eſſex's army was ſuffered to decay, all indeavors were uſed to recruit it, the moment Charles's intention was known. Care was taken to complete the regiments by freſh levies of ſoldiers, raiſed in London with all poſſible haſte and diligence: and to facilitate theſe levies, the parliament ordered the ſhops to be ſhut up 'till Gloceſter ſhould be relieved, and morever the earl's army was ſtrengthened with a numerous body of the city militia. All this was puſhed on ſo vigorouſly, that in fifteen days the earl of Eſſex was ready for marching to relieve the beſieged.

Eſſex's army recruited. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 291.

His Majeſty appeared before Gloceſter, the tenth of Auguſt *, and immediately ordered the approaches to be begun, which however were not ſo warmly puſhed as was expected, by reaſon of the frequent ſallies of the beſieged: beſide, the King was obliged to go to Oxford, which occaſioned his loſing ſeveral days. Eſſex, begining to march the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt, arrived in few days near Gloceſter, and, advancing to Preſbury hlls, drew up his whole army in view of the city, expecting his Majeſty would come and give him battle. But Charles, not thinking fit to run any hazard, raiſed the ſiege, which could not be done without great diſorder. Eſſex, entering Gloceſter, found the beſieged reduced to a ſingle barrel of powder, and no better provided with other ſtores (2). After ſtaying there three days (3), he departed towards London, paſſing thro' Tewkſbury in his way. He marched two days before the King knew he was gone, and ſurpriſed the town of Cirenceſter, where lay two regiments (4). He then croſſed North-Wiltſhire, a deep and incloſed country, which obliged him to make ſhort marches.

Soon as Charles had notice of the enemies march and route, he likewiſe ſet out in order to follow them, ſending Prince Rupert before with all his cavalry, in number five thouſand. Seemingly, his intent was that his Highneſs ſhould poſt himſelf between London and the parliament's army, while he followed, and put the army between him and his cavalry. Howſoever this was, for it is not eaſy to gueſs his Majeſty's deſign, Rupert came up with the earl of Eſſex, as he was marching over Auborn-chace, intending to have reached Newbury that night. There inſued in this place a ſharp conflict, Prince Rupert having charged the earl's rear, who were put into ſome diſorder. Marquis La Vieuville, a French nobleman, who ſerved King Charles as a voluntier, was killed in this action. This incounter conſtrained the earl of Eſſex to quarter at Hungerford. Next day, he purſued his march towards Newbury, but found that Charles had prevented

The first battle of Newbury. Sept. 30. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 267, &c. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 293. T. May.

The two armies, being too near each other to part without blows, prepared for battle, which ſoon commenced. Prince Rupert, as uſual, performed wonders with his cavalry. He immediately forced the parliament's horſe to recoil; but was careful not to commit the ſame fault he had done at Edgehill, by purſuing the runaways too far. After he had routed the enemies cavalry, he charged their infantry, who, tho' deſtitute of the aſſiſtance of their horſe, received him ſo intrepidly that he could make no impreſſion on their ſtand of pikes, but was obliged to wheel about. A ſharp fight continued the whole remainder of the day, with pretty equal ſucceſs: but at night Charles retired with his army, and left Eſſex the way open to proceed for Newbury, where he intended to lodge the preceding night. Next morning Eſſex, ſeeing the coaſt clear, purſued his march, and paſſing thro' Newbury arrived at Reading, as he had before deſigned. Prince Rupert, who followed, ſeeing him entered into the narrow lanes, attacked his rear, put it in diſorder, and took ſome priſoners; but prevented not the earl from continuing his route. He remained two days at Reading to refreſh his troops, and, without leaving a gariſon in that place, which was poſſeſſed by Charles's troops after his departure, returned to his old quarters. His Majeſty loſt in this ingagement more than twenty officers of note, and among others the earls of Sunderland, and Caernarvon, with lord Falkland, ſecretary of ſtate, who would be preſent at the fight, tho' he had no call, not being a military officer.

Remark on lord Clarendon's deſcription of the battle.

I have taken from lord Clarendon the deſcription of this battle, which by many omiſſions is rendered obſcure. Among others, it appears not what the King did with his infantry. This gives occaſion to preſume, that his foot were routed when Prince Rupert charged thoſe of the enemy: for otherwiſe, it cannot be conceived, how theſe latter could have reſiſted, had they been at once attacked by the King's infantry and cavalry. Neither is it ſeen, in this deſcription, why Charles left the field of battle in the night, ſince it does not appear that he had received any conſiderable loſs. Nevertheleſs, lord Clarendon indeavors to prove, tho' by weak arguments, that his Majeſty gained the victory. I believe it would be very eaſy to confute his reaſons, was it neceſſary. I ſhall content myſelf with ſaying in general, that the earl of Eſſex's deſign, at his departure from Gloceſter, was to return to his former quarters about London, and that the battle of Newbury hindered him not from executing it; whereas ſeemingly the King's intention was to intercept Eſſex's paſſage, which he could not effect (1).

Sept. 23. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 295.

After the ingagement, Charles retiring to Oxford, and the earl of Eſſex to Windſor, neither had much ſhare in what other actions occurred this campain. Wherefore I ſhall proceed to other parts of the kingdom, where the war was continued, and particularly in the Weſt, where it was puſhed with very great vigor.

Military actions in the Weſt.

Touching the affairs of thoſe parts, I have already intimated that the parliament did not judge proper to conſent to the neutrality entered into by the counties of Devon and Cornwal. On the contrary, they reſolved to carry the war into Cornwal, which had declared for his Majeſty. To that end, about the begining of May, while Charles's troops were at Lanceſton, few in number, and very ſhort of proviſions, the earl of Stamford, the parliament's general in the Weſt, entered Cornwal ſeven thouſand ſtrong. He poſted himſelf on the top of a hill near Stratton, whence he detached a party of twelve hundred horſe, under conduct of ſir George Chudleigh, to Bodmin, a town in the middle of this county, in order to keep it in awe and prevent the militia's joining Charles's forces, as they had done once before, Sir Ralph Hopton, who commanded for the King at Lanceſton, and had only three thouſand men, readily foreſaw he ſhould be driven out of the county, except he found means to avoid it by ſome notable exploit. This made him reſolve to march towards the enemy, tho' far ſuperior in number, and advantageouſly poſted. Stamford thought himſelf ſo ſecure from any attack, that, tho' he had frequent notice of the enemies approach, he could not believe it. Indeed, it would have been a notorious temerity in ſir Ralph Hopton, to attack him with ſo great diſadvantage, had there been any other way to ſave the county for his royal maſter. However that be, the ſixteenth of May, approaching the hill whereon Stamford lay incamped, he ordered him to be attacked from four different quarters. As the aſſailants were reſolved to conquer or die, they gained, tho' with great difficulty, the ſummit of the hill, which their enemies were at length forced to relinquiſh, after ſuſtaining the charge many hours. In this action Stamford had only three hundred men killed, but left ſeventeen hundred in the enemy's hands. Among theſe priſoners was major-general Chudleigh, who being carried to Oxford, ingaged in his Majeſty's ſervice. The earl of Stamford, whether to excuſe his defeat, or upon ſome grounds, openly complained, that Chudleigh was a traitor, having, in the heat of the battle ſhifted ſides and charged him with the body under his command. This lord Clarendon pretends was a calumny: but I ſuppoſe few now are concerned to know the truth.

Battle of Stratſon. Stamford defeated by Hopton. Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 208. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. 267, 271.

After this battle, Stamford threw himſelf into Exeter, his amy be ing diſperſed; and the party of horſe ſent to Bodmin thinking proper to retire to Plymouth, Hopton remained maſter of Cornwal. Shortly after, he was informed by a meſſenger from Oxford, that the parliament had reſolved to ſend ſir William Waller into the Weſt, with forces to join the remains of Stamford's army, and ſome levies which were to be raiſed in that country, and that the King on his part was ſending thither the marquis of Hertford and Prince Maurice with a body of troops, who were already on their march. This made him think it would be very proper for his little Corniſh army (ſo it was now called) to join the marquis's forces. He marched therefore into Devonſhire, leaving a party at Saltaſh, to defend Cornwal from any incurſions of Plymouth, and advance to Tiverton, where he expected orders from the marquis. Preſently after, hearing the marquis of Hertford was come to Chard, a town in Somerſetſhire, on the edge of Devonſhire, with ſeventeen hundred horſe and a thouſand foot, he went and joined him, and the two bodies together formed a corps ſeven thouſand ſtrong. Taunton, a large town in Somerſetſhire, was the firſt which Hertford reſolved to attack. But the gariſon ſaved him the labor, by retiring to Bridgwater, on account of a ſedition raiſed by the inhabitants. Next day, the parliament's troops quited alſo Bridgwater, and in a few days Dunſtar caſtle was ſurrendered to his Majeſty.

drawing troops together with the utmoſt diligence, and expecting more from London and Briſtol: whereupon he reſolved to attack him, without giving him time to ſtrengthen his army. While he was preparing to execute this deſign, the commitee of the militia, who were levying forces in thoſe parts to join them with Waller's, perceiving a favorable opportunity, beat up one of the marquis's quarters, who was now advanced to Somerton, and gave Charles's troops ſuch a briſk alarm, that the marquis was forced to draw up the whole army. Then the parliament's forces retired to Wells: but ſeeing they were purſued, quited Wells, and poſted themſelves on the top of Mendip hill, which overlooks that city. Hertford, being come to Wells, ſtayed there, evening coming on a pace. But Prince Maurice, ſir Ralph Hopton, and the earl of Caernarvon, taking the enemies retreat for a flight, went out with two regiments of horſe in their purſuit, and marched directly to them, whereupon the parliamentarians, being moſtly infantry and few in number, retired in order to join a detachment of horſe ſent by Waller to ſupport them. But the earl of Caernarvon, who was fartheſt advanced, gave them not time to retreat in any tolerable order. As they were obliged to paſs thro' a lane, he entered after them, and purſued them 'till he met with Waller's cavalry, who ſtoped his career, and in his turn forced him to retire with great precipitation. Prince Maurice coming to his relief, a warm action inſued, wherein his ſaid Highneſs received two cuts in the head, and was beaten off his horſe, but was fotunately relieved. Night obliged both parties to retire, his Majeſty's to Wells, and the parliament's to Bath.

Incounter wherein Prince Maurice is wounded. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 216.

Some days after, Hertford, knowing Waller's army daily increaſed, marched towards Bath, to attempt drawing him to an ingagement. But Waller having his reaſon to defer it, becauſe he ſtill expected freſh ſupplies, the marquis advanced to Marsfield, five miles beyond Bath: whereupon Waller marched out of Bath, and drew up his army on Lanſdown, expecting the enemies, who failed not to move towards him. As Hertford was in a country ſo diſaffected to King Charles, that only force could procure him any ſupply or relief, and as beſide, he was advanced beyond Bath purpoſely to ingage them to fight, he was unwilling to loſe the opportunity. In this action, which was called the battle of Lanſdown, of his two thouſand horſe, the marquis loſt above fifteen hundred. But on the other hand, he drove Waller from his poſt, and compelled him to give way, about demi-culvering ſhot. Next day, Waller retired to Bath, and the marquis remained abſolute maſter of the field (1).

Battle of Lanſdown wherein the marquis loſt moſt of his cavalry. July 5. Id. p. 218. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 284.

But this inconſiderable advantage, gained with the loſs of near all his cavalry, threw him into a very ill ſituation. He had been ſent into the Weſt to drive thence ſir William Waller, and yet, after the battle, Waller was between the King's army and the Weſtern counties, where the marquis could penetrate only by a ſecond battle, which he was not in condition to hazard, as being without horſe. This made him determine on marching to the Devizes, leaving there his infantry under command of ſir Ralph Hopton (2), and breaking thro' to Oxford, with Maurice and what remained of his cavalry, in expectation of returning thence with a body of horſe ſtrong enough to bring off the foot he ſhould leave at the Devizes, diſtant but thirty miles from Oxford. This reſolution was purſued: but as ſoon as he had quited his infantry at the Devizes, Waller came before the town with his whole army, and inveſted theſe troops, who were in a very indifferent ſtate by reaſon of the ſcarcity of proviſions. As he was ſenſible, the beſieged could not remain long in ſuch neceſſity, he made them an overture of capitulating with him, which Hopton gladly imbraced, in the uncertainty whether any ſupplies would come from Oxford, or would arrive ſoon enough. He entered therefore into treaty with Waller; but with intention to prolong it as much as poſſible, and not yield 'till the laſt extremity, as hoping every moment to be relieved from Oxford. Waller was ſo confident that they were at his mercy, that he had ſent the parliament word, "That their buſineſs was done, and by the "the nexr poſt, he would ſend the number and "quality of his priſoners."

Hopton feigns to capitulate.

Mean while the marquis of Hertford and Prince Maurice having reached Oxford, and repreſented to Charles the diſtreſs of his troops at the Devizes, his Majeſty immediately ſent away lord Wilmot, with fifteen hundred horſe, who came within two miles of the Devizes before the capitulation between Hopton and Waller was ſigned.

Wilmot ſent to relieve the Devizes. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 223.

Waller was no ſooner informed of the enemies approach, but he drew up his whole army on Roundway-down, over which the King's troops were neceſſarily to paſs, in order to join thoſe in the town. Wilmot, finding he could not execute his deſign without fighting, drew up within muſquet-ſhot of Waller's army: but perhaps he would have thought of it more than once, before he would with fifteen hundred horſe have ventured on enemies ſo ſuperior in number, had not Waller begun the fight, by charging him with a regiment of cuiraſſiers lately ſent from London, and which had thitherto been deemed invincible (3). This regiment was vigorouſly repulſed, and retreating in diſorder, infuſed ſuch a terror into Wallers' troops, that they made but a faint reſiſtance. Mean while Hopton, ſeeing from the town the enemy's diſorder, ſallied with his foot, and bravely ſeconding Wilmot, who for his part gave not the enemies time to recover themſelves, they ſoon put to rout the whole army, killed five or ſix thouſand, and took nine hundred priſoners. Waller after his defeat, eſcaped to Briſtol. He highly complained of the earl of Eſſex, who, lying then at Thame, had ſuffered Wilmot to paſs without ſending a party after him, or giving the allarm to Oxford, which would have cauſed Wilmot to be recalled. Contrariwiſe Eſſex, who was no friend to Waller, could not forbear making ſome reproachful animadverſions on his defeat. This bred between them ſuch enmity, that it might have proved extremely prejudicial to their party, had not the parliament taken care to effect a reconciliation.

opened at the first summons. Presently after Charles, as has been hinted, being determined on the siege of Bristol, ordered the Cornish army to join Prince Rupert at the siege. As soon as he was master of Bristol, he resolved to send an army into the West, under Prince Maurice's conduct, and to keep the marquis of Hertford near his person. To that end, he gave orders to Robert Dormer, earl of Caernarvon, who was to serve under Maurice, to advance towards the West with a party of horse, while that Prince should follow with the infantry, of which the Cornish army made the best part. Caernarvon marched first into Dorsetshire, which declared for the parliament, and took Weymouth, Dorchester and Portland-castle. Here arrived Maurice and joined his cavalry. When his Highness had headed the army, he suffered his troops to use such license, and so ill observed the articles made upon the surrender of places, that the earl of Caernarvon quited his command in this army, and returned to his Majesty before Gloucester. Mean while Maurice, after staying some time in Dorsetshire, entered Devonshire, and laid siege to Exeter, which the earl of Stamford surrendered by capitulation.

After taking Exeter, Prince Maurice applied himself chiefly to increase the number of his forces by fresh levies, while the parliament had no army in that country able to make head against him. In a short space, he assembled seven thousand foot, with horse proportionably, beside three thousand men commanded by colonel John Digby before Plymouth, which place he had blocaded 'till the Prince should come and besiege it in form. There had lately been discovered at Plymouth a plot framed by sir Alexander Carew, knight of the shire for Cornwal, and governor of the fort and island of St. Nicholas, on which depended the town's security, to deliver the island and fort to his Majesty. Carew was apprehended and sent to London, where some time after he was condemned to die by a court-martial (1).

Maurice takes Dartmouth, and besieges Plymouth. October 6. Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 297.

When Prince Maurice had completed his levies, instead of going to Plymouth, he laid siege to Dartmouth, which held him imployed upwards of a month. During that time, the inhabitants of Plymouth, whom the discovery of Carew's conspiracy had thrown into a great consternation, recovered themselves, and resolved on an a staut resistance. This resolution was confirmed by a supply of five hundred men sent by the parliament by sea, with a Scotish governor, a person well experienced in martial affairs. So, Prince Maurice, when he came before the place, found its reduction for more difficult than he had expected. He however continued the siege, notwithstanding the winter, which was now begun. Here I shall quit the West, 'till I have farther occasion to resume these matters, and proceed to what passed in the North during this campain.

Military actions in the North.

State of those quarters.

Since the earl of Newcastle's arrival at York, with his army levied in the North, lord Fairfax had been obliged to keep at some distance from that city, to avoid being attacked by an army much more numerous than his own. All the northern parts, from York to the borders of Scotland, were for the King. The southern part of Yorkshire was for the parliament, and war was raging in the middle parts of the country, to right and left. But little else was transacted, beside the taking a few small towns, which served only to extend one or the other army's quarters.

Lord Fairfax beats 3000 of the King's party at Wakefield.

In May 1643, the earl of Newcastle took two or three of these places. In the same month, lord Fairfax, having detached fifteen hundred men, under command of his son, sir Thomas Fairfax, ordered him to attack Wakefield, where lay three thousand royalist. This attack was made about four in the morning, with such vigor and conduct, that the King's troops were driven from the town, and many slain and taken. Among the prisoners was the commander, general Goring.

Presently after, the earl of Newcastle had his revenge. Having taken Howley-house, he marched thence towards Bradford, and in the way was met on Atherton-moor by lord Fairfax, whom he intirely routed. Fairfax, with the remains of his army, threw himself into Hull, where sir John Hotham had been lately apprehended by order of parliament, and lord Fairfax was appointed governor of that important place.

In June, Gainsborough, a town in Lincolnshire, was seized by lord Willoughby *, commander for the parliament in those parts, who there took prisoner the earl of Kingston. But being informed that the earl of Newcastle was preparing to recover Gainsborough, he sent his prisoner to Hull in a pinnace. The earl was unfortunately shot by some of his own party, who would have stayed the pinnace. Mean while, the earl of Newcastle began his march to besiege Gainsborough, and at his approach detached a party of horse to invest the town. Oliver Cromwel, arriving at the same time, with design to supply the town with provisions, defeated this detachment, pursuing them even in sight of their main body, which he imagined not to be so near. As he was not in condition to face this army, he retreated in good order, and, after throwing supplies into Gainsborough, retired to a greater distance. Soon after, the earl of Newcastle retook that town, and possessed himself of Lincoln, where he left a numerous garison; which done, he besieged Hull, while his Majesty lay before Gloucester.

Lord Fairfax, assisted by sir John Meldrum, a Scot, defended Hull with great bravery and conduct during five weeks, tho' he was very vigorously attacked. Finally, October the eleventh, the besiegers made a grand sally, and, after a most obstinate fight, which was several times renewed, beat the besiegers from their trenches, and seized their cannon. This obliged the earl of Newcastle, now created marquis, to raise the siege.

The other military exploits, during the winter after this campain, having a necessary connection with the affairs of Scotland and Ireland, I am indispensibly obliged to speak of what passed in these two kingdoms in the course of this year. I shall begin with Scotland.

Affairs of Scotland. p. 390.

The English parliament, when they replied to the Scots proposition of uniting the two national churches, made their answer (which was no less ambiguous than the demand) a tool, which they might use or not, as occasion required. It is certain, there was a strict correspondence between some leading members, and the Scots. These members easily foresaw that, to establish Presbytery in England, they should in the end want the Scots, who, on their part, were ready to assist them when a favorable opportunity should offer. As King Charles, in his last journey to Scotland, had been obliged to grant the Scots whatever they desired, the leaders of the adverse party had taken such just measures, that all the offices of that kingdom were in the hands of their friends, while thoſe who were ſuſpected of inclining to the King were removed from all imploy. By this means, the Engliſh parliament's friends were in a capacity to ſecond them in eſtabliſhing a Preſbyterian government in the church of England, on the firſt fair occaſion. It was not ſolely thro' zeal for religion, but alſo thro' policy, that the directors of the Scotiſh affairs wiſhed the Engliſh would receive that form of government. They believed they could never promiſe themſelves a perfect tranquillity, if it ſhould happen to be in Charles's power to be revenged on them, and that he would be inceſſantly prompted to it, if prelates were reſtored in England. Whether this belief was well-grounded, or only a prejudice, it is certain they looked on the reſtoration of prelacy in England as the firſt ſtep to their ruin. For this reaſon, they conſtantly held a very ſtrict correſpondence with both houſes, by means of their commiſſioners reſiding in London, in order to act in concert with them for abridging the regal power, and deſtroying epiſcopacy. This plainly appeared in the courſe of this year 1643.

The ſtates of Scotland convened, ſpite of Hamilton's oppoſition. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 463.

The parliament's affairs not being in a ſituation to afford a proſpect of any great advantages over his Majeſty this campain, the Scots began to prepare to aſſiſt them, in caſe it was requiſite. To that purpoſe, about the begining of May, it was moved by ſome of the leading men, that there might be a joint meeting of the council, the conſervators of the peace, and the commiſſioners for public burdens. In the hands of all theſe was lodged the authority of the kingdom, when there was no parliament. This motion was readily complied with, all public offices and poſts being, as I ſaid, filled with men of that party. In this aſſembly it was propoſed, that, conſidering the danger the kingdom was in, by reaſon of armies levying in the north of England, Scotland ſhould be put in a poſture of defenſe. As this could not be done without a parliament, or a convention of eſtates, it was urged, that there was abſolute neceſſity of immediately ſummoning ſuch convention. Marquis Hamilton, and ſeveral others, ſtrongly oppoſed it, alleging; That for them to appoint a convention without the King's order, was an incroachment upon the royal prerogative in the higheſt degree: that his Majeſty had promiſed to call a parliament in the year 1644, and therefore to hold a convention of eſtates before that time, without his privity, was directly contrary to the laws of the land. But their arguments were fruitleſs. It was carried by a majority, that the lord-chancellor ſhould ſummon a convention of eſtates, againſt the twenty-ſecond of June. They make a diſtinction in Scotland between a convention of eſtates, and a parliament. The convention of eſtates is a court conſiſting of all the members of parliament; but as they are called, and ſit without the ſtate, or formalities uſed in parliament, ſo their power extends only to raiſe money or forces, but not to make or repeal laws.

May 15.

Charles, having intelligence of what was projecting in Scotland, immediately ſent thither the earls of Roxborough, Kinnoul, and Lanerick, with inſtructions concerning what they were to do for his ſervice. Theſe three Scotiſh peers arrived at Edinburg the fifteenth of May, and brought marquis Hamilton a patent, creating him duke. They moreover preſented to the council a declaration from his Majeſty, wherein he indeavored to diſplay the juſtice of his cauſe againſt the parliament of England. He vindicated his innocence, with regard to all the aſperſions caſt upon him, particularly touching religion, and repreſented moſt pathetically the wrongs and injuſtices done him. As we have more than once ſeen what this Prince alleged in his vindication, I deem it needleſs to inſert this declaration. I ſhall only obſerve, that he concluded with ſaying, "God ſo deal with us, and "our poſterity, as we ſhall inviolably obſerve the "laws and ſtatutes of that our native kingdom, "and the Proteſtant religion; the laws of the land, "the juſt privileges and freedom of parliament."

CHARLES I An' 1643.

Not long after Charles, hearing that a convention of eſtates was ſummoned without his order or privity, eaſily perceived this ſtep was not taken without intention to ſupport it. He choſe therefore to permit their aſſembling, but with expreſs order to limit their conſultations to the beſt ways and means of ſupplying the Scotiſh army in Ireland, and to relieving public burdens, by preſſing a ſpeedy payment of the brotherly aſſiſtance due from England. But the convention was not any way diſpoſed to be thus reſtrained. When the eſtates met, the firſt thing in debate was the limitation in his Majeſty's letter of licenſe. Duke Hamilton with Charles's other friends (1), voted it 'no convention "but as regulated by his Majeſty's letter;' but all the reſt voted it 'a free convention (2).' Charles afterwards pretended, Hamilton and his brother, the earl of Lanerick, had not ſerved him with ſincerity, and might, had they pleaſed, have hindered the convention from meeting. Theſe two noble Scots repairing to Oxford ſome time after, he ordered them to be apprehended; but Lanerick found means to eſcape, and his brother the duke was impriſoned in St. Michael's Mount-caſtle, in Cornwal. Lord Clarendon, in his hiſtory, ſupports to the utmoſt of his power Charles's ſuſpicions of theſe two brothers, while we contrariwiſe find them very amply juſtified, in Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton.

The convention of eſtates met, the twenty-ſecond of June, and the general-aſſembly of the kirk, the ſecond of Auguſt. It is obſervable that, in June, the Engliſh parliament publiſhed their ordinance, calling an aſſembly of divines, and others, to be conſulted by both houſes, for ſetling the government and liturgy of the church of England, and that this aſſembly held their firſt ſeſſion the firſt of July, a few days after the eſtates in Scotland aſſembled. The ſequel manifeſted with what deſign this meeting was appointed.

The precaution uſed by the Scots was not ineffectual: they ſeem to have foreſeen what happened ſoon after; for, in the interval between the propoſing a convention of eſtates, and the time of their aſſembling, the earl of Eſſex's army was ſeized with ſickneſs after taking Reading; the city of Briſtol fell into the King's hands; and ſir William Waller's forces were routed at Roundway-down. Had not Charles's ſucceſſes received a check, by raiſing the ſiege of Gloceſter, and the battle of Newbury, it is very viſible the parliament's affairs were in a very bad ſituation about the end of July and begining of Auguſt, i. e. when the convention of eſtates, and general-aſſembly, met in Scotland. Accordingly, both houſes failed not improving the precaution taken by the Scots, and which had, very ſeemingly, been ſuggeſted to them. As they ſaw their affairs were declining, they applied, without farther heſitation, to the convention of Scotland for aſſiſtance, and ſent commiſſioners with full powers to treat. Theſe commiſſioners, who came to Edinburg while Charles was approaching Gloceſter, found the Scotiſh eſtates as well diſpoſed as they could have deſired.

CHARLES I An' 1643.

Scotland would demand, in return for their aſſiſtance, a poſitive ingagement to eſtabliſh in the church of England a Preſbyterian government, like that in the Scotiſh kirk. It is ſcarcely to be doubted, that ſome of the directors of the parliament's affairs had made with them ſuch a private agreement; tho' it cannot be proved by any public acts: nay, to all appearance, Eſſex's army had been ſuffered to decay purpoſely to reduce matters to ſuch a ſtate, that the aſſiſtance of the Scots ſhould be abſolutely neceſſary; at leaſt, it is not eaſy to comprehend what elſe could have induced the parliament to ſuffer that army to remain unſerviceable, from the taking of Reading to the ſiege of Gloceſter. It appeared that this did not wholly proceed from inability; ſince, when the danger grew more imminent, means were found to inable the earl of Eſſex to relieve Gloceſter. Now it was preciſely while Eſſex's army was thus neglected, that the parliament reſolved to deſire the aſſiſtance of Scotland. But howſoever this was, both houſes ſent with their commiſſioners two declarations, one directed to the convention, and one to the general-aſſembly. The firſt was, only to deſire the eſtates ſpeedy aſſiſtance, and to intimate, that their commiſſioners had inſtructions to treat with them, not only concerning the ſatisfaction to be made for the deſired aid, but alſo about ſetling accounts between the two kingdoms. In the ſecond, both houſes acknowledged the great zeal and love, manifeſted by the general-aſſembly of the Scotiſh churches, in their indeavors for the preſervation of the true Proteſtant religion, from the attempts of the Popiſh prelatical party, to the neceſſary reformation of church-government in England, and the nearer union of both churches. Therefore they exhorted the aſſembly to ſend into England ſome of their body, for the fartherance of that work, in conjunction with the aſſembly of divines now ſiting at Weſtminſter. They likewiſe declared that, beſide their inſtructions in the civil matters of both kingdoms, the commiſſioners had received directions to reſort to and conſult with the general-aſſembly of the kirk of Scotland, in every thing relating to the reformation of the church of England; and to that end, meſſ. Marſhal and Nye, miniſters of God's word, were appointed to aſſiſt the commiſſioners with their advice.

p. 469.

With theſe declarations the commiſſioners found no difficulty in their negociation. On the contrary, the general-aſſembly addreſſed to the eſtates a declaration, containing the reaſons which ought to induce them to aſſiſt the parliament of England. The reaſons were to this purport, viz.

The general-aſſembly's reaſons for aſſiſting the Engliſh parliament. P. 472.

" 1. The controverſy now in England, being " betwixt the Lord Jeſus and anti-chriſt with his " followers, if we would not come under the " curſe of Meroz, we ſhould come out, and help " the Lord againſt the Mighty.

" 2. There was an act paſſed by the convention " of eſtates, Anno 1585, wherein the eſtates " found it neceſſary to enter into a league and " Chriſtian confederation, with all Proteſtant " Princes and eſtates, againſt the bloody league at " Trent. Conformably thereto, there followed a " league betwixt the two crowns of Scotland and " England, ſubſcribed at Berwick 1586, againſt " whatſoever foreign and inteſtine powers of Pa- " piſts ſhould arrive, or riſe. And therefore, " the cauſe being the ſame, as well as the parties " and the danger, we are bound to perform now " what we promiſed then.

" 3. We ſtand obliged to England for old kind- " neſs to us, being in the ſame poſture then which " they are in now; for in the years 1556 and " 1557, the eſtates of this land, finding the re- " formation of religion oppoſed by their own " Princes with arms and violence, and them- " ſelves oppreſſed by the Popiſh army, ſought " and obtained the aſſiſtance of an army from " England, whereby they expelled the French " army, made the pacification at Leith, held the " parliament of 1560, eſtabliſhed the religion. " Therefore they got new aſſiſtance from Eng- " land to ſuppreſs the general Popiſh faction, " whereby they took in the caſtle of Edinburg " from the laird of Grange; and in that public " printed prayer, prefixed to the Pſalm-book, we " ſolemnly promiſed never to forget their kind- " neſs againſt the French; and if we call to mind " the manifeſtation of the lawfulneſs of the expedi- " tion into England, we ſtand obliged to them for " their late kindneſs; for they not only refuſed " to levy arms againſt us in the laſt troubles, in " 1639, but alſo did mediate for a treaty, did " welcome and kindly entertain our army for a " year, did freely beſtow upon us their brotherly " aſſiſtance of thirty thouſand pounds; whereupon " we acknowledged our thankfulneſs not to con- " ſiſt in affection and words at that time, but in " the mutual kindneſs and real declaration to be " expected from the whole kingdom of Scotland, " in all time to come; beſide ſolemn promiſes " and vows repeated in our late declaration and " information publiſhed to the world, wherein we " aſſure them of our help in their need, as in the " Remonſtrance of the States of Scotland, 1639, " pag. 28. Remonſtrance of the Parliament of " England, 1640, pag. 15, 16. Intentions of the " Army of Scotland, near the end.

" 4. The common danger, imminent to both " kirks and kingdoms, doth invite us to help " them; for we and they ſail in one bottom, dwell " in one houſe, are members of one body, that, " according to their own principles, if either of " the two nations, or kirks, be ruinated, the other " cannot long ſubſiſt. We have the ſame friends and " foes, and many years experience hath taught us, " what influence Popery and prelacy in England " may have upon Scotland; from thence came the " prelates, the ceremonies, the book of Common- " prayers, Service-book, and, upon our refuſal, " the bloody ſword came from thence; therefore " we are to take England's condition to heart, as " a common cauſe, to put forth our helping hand, " if we tender religion, laws and liberties.

" 5. The common advantages, redounding to " both kirks and kingdoms, do perſuade help; " for hereby we have a fair opportunity to ad- " vance uniformity in diſcipline and worſhip, " which will prove the ſureſt bond of union and " a bulwark to both.

" 6. If we forſake England, we forſake our " deareſt friends, who can beſt help us in caſe " we be reduced to the like ſtraits hereafter, by " the common adverſary.

" 7. If we ſuffer the parliament of England to " be cut off, we have loſt our peace with Eng- " land. If the Popiſh and prelatical faction do " over-rule the parliament, we may expect war " both from King and parliament, whereunto they " will not want pretenſes. And we have reaſon " to fear that, ſeeing ſome of the malignants at " home are reported to have vented, that the " King was not tied to keep what he had granted " to us, becauſe, by calling and keeping of our " convention, we have firſt broken to him.

" 8. If we ſhould deſert them at this time, yet, " as Mordecai ſaid to Eſther, 'Deliverance ſhall " ariſe to them from elſewhere, but we and our " father's houſe may look for deſtruction;' and " who knoweth, but we are reſtored to our reli- " gion and liberties, to a free convention at this " time, and made a mirror of God's mercy to all " nations

" nations and kirks, that we may help our brethren " of England?

" 9. That the only means for procuring a happy " agreement betwixt the King and parliament, is " by puting up the ſword, and ſaving Chriſtian " blood from being ſhed, ſuppreſſing Papiſts, and " eſtabliſhing religion in his dominions; for hum- " ble ſupplications and remonſtrances, reached out " with naked hands, will not prevail with our ad- " verſaries, who have invironed our King, and " cloſed his ears to the cry of his ſubjects.

" But it will be objected; ſeeing our religion " and liberties are eſtabliſhed according to our " own deſires; and ſeeing his Majeſty's declara- " tion to the whole kingdom, and letter to every " nobleman and burrough, to give aſſurance for " the preſervation of the ſame without altering, " we have no intereſt nor hazard, however buſineſs " go in England, but ſhould keep ourſelves in " peace and quiet.

" 1. Anſwer. In all the proceedings of this " buſineſs, we have from time to time declared, " that neither verbal promiſes, nor fair declara- " tions for maintaining religion and liberty could " ſecure us, becauſe we have ſo often found 'facta " verbis contraria.' As for example; the treaty of " Dunce, when we confided to verbal gracious ex- " preſſions of his Majeſty's; yet afterwards they " were denied, and burned by the hands of the " hangman, and an army levied againſt us. It was " the counſel of Monſieur de Thou to the Queen- " regent of Scotland, at St. Andrews, for re- " verſing our firſt reformation, to grant our pre- " deceſſors in fair promiſes and declarations all " they craved, and when thereby they ſhould be " divided, to interpret theſe by herſelf, and to " take order with the heads of the opponers; and " this policy was uſed by Charles IX. King of " France, for the ſubverting of the Proteſtant re- " ligion in France, as witneſſeth Monſieur de " Thou, L. 71. p. 463.

" 2. As we have found by former experience, " that the eſtabliſhment of our firſt reformation, " by an act of aſſembly and parliament, could not " ſecure us from the violent preſſing of innova- " tions againſt both; and in the new remonſtrance " of 1640, pag. 16. we have fully expreſſed, " that no aſſembly, or parliament, whereunto we " faſtened our hopes, can be any ſafety for us, ſo " long as our enemies ſit at the helm, and govern " the King's council, and make his Majeſty inter- " pret laws contrary to the advice of judicators " of kirk and ſtate. And of late our mediation be- " twixt him and his parliament was rejected, and " our commiſſioners ſtoped from going to Lon- " don, contrary to his own ſafe-conduct.

" 3. If the now parliament of England be de- " ſtroyed, who ſhall undertake for our ſafety? As " the King's declarations cannot exceed his perſon, " or ſecure us at the hands of his ſucceſſors, ſo we " may perceive, in the late diſcovery of the plots " of the Scotiſh, Engliſh and Iriſh Papiſts, that " theſe declarations can be no ſufficient ſecurity " againſt the ſurpriſing of Papiſts and malignants, " if they be permited to carry arms within any of " the kingdoms.

Covenant between the two nations approved in Scotland and England. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 475. Guthry's Mem.

The aſſembly and convention having reſpectively appointed commitees to treat with the Engliſh commiſſioners, it was at the firſt conferences agreed, that the beſt and ſpeedieſt means for accompliſhing the union and aſſiſtance deſired was, that both nations ſhould enter into a mutual league or covenant. This covenant was very ſoon got ready, ſo that, Auguſt the ſeventeenth, it was preſented to the eſtates and general-aſſembly, and approved by both that very day. On the morrow, being the eighteenth, it was ſent to England by lord Maitland, afterwards duke Lauderdale. He was accompanied by mr. Alexander Henderſon, moderator of the general-aſſembly, and mr. Gilleſpy, both miniſters, as commiſſioners from the aſſembly to treat with the aſſembly of divines at Weſtminſter, about uniting the two churches.

If the Scots were diſpoſed to enter into a league with the Engliſh, theſe latter were not thereof leſs deſirous. Auguſt twenty-eight, ten days after the Scotiſh commiſſioners ſet out, the parliament of England conſented to the covenant. Immediately after, the aſſembly of divines were ordered by both houſes to frame an exhortation to taking the covenant, to be publicly read in every church. That done, the covenant was ordered to be printed and publiſhed, and appointed to be taken the twenty-ſecond of September by all the members of parliament, and the aſſembly of divines; which was performed with great ſolemnity. The covenant runs in theſe terms: viz.

A ſolemn league and covenant for reformation and defenſe of religion, the honor and happineſs of the King, and the peace and ſafety of the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

And whereas the happineſs of a bleſſed " peace between theſe kingdoms, denied in former " times to our progenitors, is by the good providence " of God granted unto us, and hath been lately " concluded and ſetled by both parliaments, we " ſhall, each one of us, according to our place " and intereſt, indeavor that they may remain " conjoined in a firm peace and union to all poſte- " rity, and that juſtice may be done upon the " wilful oppoſers thereof, in manner expreſſed in " the precedent articles.

CHARLES I An' 1643.

" VI. We ſhall alſo, according to our places " and callings, in this common cauſe of religion, " liberty and peace of the kingdoms, aſſiſt and de- " fend all thoſe who enter into this league and cove- " nant, in the maintaining and purſuing thereof, " and ſhall not ſuffer ourſelves, directly or indi- " rectly, by whatſoever combination, perſuaſion, " or terror, to be divided and withdrawn from " this bleſſed union and conjunction, whether to " make defection to the contrary part, or to give " ourſelves to a deteſtable indifferency or neutrality " in this cauſe, which ſo much concerneth the " glory of God, the good of the kingdoms, and " the honor of the King; but ſhall, all the days " of our lives, zealouſly and conſtantly continue " therein, againſt all oppoſition, and promote the " ſame according to our power againſt all lets and " impediments whatſoever; and what we are not " able ourſelves to ſuppreſs or overcome, we ſhall " reveal and make known, that it may be timely " prevented or removed: all which we ſhall do as " in the ſight of God.

And our true and unfeigned purpoſe, de- " ſire and indeavor, for ourſelves, and all others " under our power and charge, both in public " and in private, in all duties we owe to God and " man, to amend our lives, and each one to " go before another in the example of a real refor- " mation; that the Lord may turn away his " wrath and heavy indignation, and eſtabliſh theſe " churches and kingdoms in truth and peace. And " this covennnt we make in the preſenſe of Al- " mighty God, the ſearcher of all hearts, with a true " intention to perfom the ſame, as we ſhall anſwer " at that great day, when the ſecrets of all hearts " ſhall be diſcloſed; moſt humbly beſeeching the " Lord to ſtrengthen us by his holy ſpirit for this " end, and to bleſs our deſires and proceedings " with ſuch ſucceſs, as may be deliverance and " ſafety to his people, and incouragement to other " Chriſtian churches, groaning under, or in dan- " ger of, the yoke of Anti-chriſtian tyranny to " join in the ſame, or like aſſociation and cove- " nant. To the glory of God, the inlargement " of the kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt, and the peace " and tranquillity of Chriſtian kingdoms and com- " monwealths."

Reaſon why the Covenant was ſo readily received in England.

I have frequently intimated, that the Preſbyterian party prevailed in the Engliſh parliament. This party impatiently waited for ſome opportunity to eſtabliſh the Preſbyterian government in the church, and this ſeemed to them ſo favorable, that they reſolved not to loſe it. The parliament's affairs had but a very indifferent aſpect. The King was become maſter of Briſtol. Eſſex's army was unſerviceable, and Waller's utterly ruined or diſperſed by the loſs of Roundway-down battle. Prince Maurice was with a ſtout army in the Weſt, where he met with no oppoſition. The marquis of Newcaſtle was maſter of all the North, and ſuperior in in ſtrength to lord Fairfax in Yorkſhire. Moreover, his Majeſty was actually beſieging Gloceſter, when the parliament's commiſſioners arrived at Edinburg. Had Charles reduced that place, the parliament would have had reaſon to fear a general defection, conſidering the advantages he would have thereby received. The two houſes had therefore, if I may ſo term it, no other refuge than the aſſiſtance of the Scots, which could not be otherwiſe procured, than by yielding them the article of uniformity, ſo paſſionately deſired by them, being, in their opinion, the ſole means of ſecuring the injoyment of their liberties. So, thoſe of the parliament's party, who were moſt attached to the church of England, clearly perceived, they muſt conſent to a change of church-government, or be expoſed to the hazard of loſing the fruit of all their labors, in caſe the King ſhould be reſtored by force of arms. Matters ſtanding thus, they could not think it ſtrange, that the parliament ſhould agree to ſuch uniformity, in order to ſatisfy the Scots for their ſo neceſſary aſſiſtance. For this reaſon the covenant was taken without murmuring; nor was it perceived, that this procedure would increaſe the number of his Majeſty's friends, as the parliament had ever dreaded, becauſe it was done at a juncture, when the neceſſity of it ſeemed unavoidable.

Charles in vain forbids taking the covenant. October 9. Ruſhworth. Vol. V. p. 248.

Soon after, Charles iſſued a proclamation, which ſtrictly inhibited taking the covenant; but it produced no great effect. Contrariwiſe, the commitee of eſtates did, by their printed act of the twenty-ſecond of October, ordain it to be ſworn and ſubſcribed by all the ſubjects, under pain of having their goods and rents confiſcated. After that, they ſummoned all the lords of the council to come and ſign it before them. Duke Hamilton, with ſome others, refuſing to ſubſcribe it, the commitee, by another act, ordered all their lands to be ſeized, and their perſons apprehended, with licenſe to kill ſuch as reſiſted. Charles nevertheleſs, at the duke's coming to Oxford, cauſed him, as I obſerved, to be arreſted.

It is ordered to be taken in Scotland under ſevere penalties. p. 484. Nov. 17.

When both kingdoms had thus agreed on the covenant, the eſtates of Scotland appointed commiſſioners to treat with the Engliſh, concerning the deſired aſſiſtance. The ſubſtance of this treaty, ſigned November twenty-nine, is as follows:

Treaty between England and Scotland. p. 485.

" 1. That the covenant be ſworn and ſubſcribed by both kingdoms.

" 2. That an army ſhall be forthwith levied in Scotland, conſiſting of eighteen thouſand foot effective, and two thouſand horſe, and one thouſand dragoons effective, with a ſuitable train of artillery, to be ready at ſome general rendezvous near the borders, to march into England with all convenient ſpeed; the ſaid foot and horſe to be well and completely armed, and provided with victuals and pay for forty days.

" 3. That the army be commanded by a general appointed by the eſtates of Scotland, and ſubject to ſuch reſolutions and directions as ſhall be agreed and concluded on mutually between the two kingdoms, or by commitees appointed by them in that behalf.

" 4. That the charge of levying, arming and bringing the ſaid forces together, as alſo the train of artillery, be computed and ſet down according to the ſame rates, as if the kingdom of Scotland was to raiſe the ſaid army for themſelves; all which for the preſent is to be done by the kingdom of Scotland upon accompt, and the accompt to be delivered to the commiſſioners of the kingdom of England; and when the peace of the two kingdoms is ſetled, the ſame to be repaid, or ſatisfied to the kingdom of Scotland.

" 5. That this army be likewiſe paid, as if the kingdom of Scotland was to imploy the ſame for their own occaſion; and towards the defraying thereof, ſhall be monthly allowed and paid the ſum of 30,000 l. ſterling, by the parliament of England, out of the eſtates and revenues of the Papiſts, prelates, malignants, and their adherents, or otherwiſe; and in caſe the ſaid 30,000 l. monthly, or any part thereof, be not paid at the time when it ſhall become due, the kingdom of England ſhall give the public faith for paying the remainder unpaid with all poſſible ſpeed, allowing the rate of 8 l. per cent. for the time of the performance thereof; and in caſe that, notwithſtanding the ſaid monthly ſum of 30,000 l. paid as aforeſaid, the ſtates and kingdom of Scotland ſhall have juſt cauſe to demand farther ſatisfaction of their brethren of England, when the peace of both kingdoms is ſetled, for the pains, hazard and charges they have undergone in the ſame, they ſhall, by way of brotherly aſſiſtance, have due recompenſe made to them by the kingdom of England, and that out of ſuch lands and eſtates of the Papiſts, prelates, malignants, and their adherents; and for the aſſurance thereof the public faith of the kingdom of England ſhall be given them. CHARLES I An' 1643.

" 6. And to the end the ſaid army may be inabled and prepared to march, the kingdom of England is to pay in ready money to their brethren of Scotland the ſum of 100,000 l. ſterling, at Leith, or Edinburg, by way of advance beforehand, which is to be diſcounted back again to the kingdom of England by the kingdom of Scotland, upon the firſt monthly allowance which ſhall grow due to the Scotiſh army, from the time they ſhall make their firſt entrance into the kingdom of England.

" 7. That the public faith of the kingdom of Scotland will be given to be jointly made uſe of with the public faith of the kingdom of England, for the preſent taking up 200,000 l. ſterling in the kingdom of England, or elſewhere, for the ſpeedy procuring of the ſaid 100,000 l. ſterling as aforeſaid, as alſo a conſiderable ſum for the ſatisfying, in good proportion, the arrears of the Scotiſh army in Ireland.

" 8. That no ceſſation, nor any pacification or agreement of peace whatſoever, ſhall be made without the mutual advice and conſent of both kingdoms.

" 9. That the public faith of the kingdom of Scotland ſhall be given to their brethren of England, that neither their entrance into, nor their continuance in the kingdom of England, ſhall be made uſe of to any other ends than are expreſſed in the covenant, and in the articles of this treaty: and that all matters of difference which ſhall happen to ariſe between the ſubjects of the two nations, ſhall be reſolved and determined by the mutual advice and conſent of both kingdoms, or by ſuch commitees as, for this purpoſe, ſhall be by them appointed.

" 10. That the kingdom of England do oblige themſelves to aid and aſſiſt the kingdom of Scotland, in the ſame or like caſes of ſtreights and extremities.

" That, during the time the Scotiſh army ſhall be imployed, as aforeſaid, for defenſe of the kingdom of Scotland, there ſhall be fited out, as men of war, eight ſhips, whereof ſix ſhall be of burden betwixt one hundred and twenty and two hundred ton, the other between three and four hundred ton; all which ſhall be maintained at the charge of the kingdom of England,

" land,

" land, to be imployed for defenſe of the coaſt of " Scotland, under ſuch commanders as the earl of " Warwick, for the time of his being admiral, ſhall " nominate, with the approbation of the commitees " of both kingdoms; which commanders ſhall re- " ceive from the ſaid earl general inſtructions, that " they do from time to time obſerve the directions " of the commitees of both kiugdoms."

An army got ready in Scotland.

Tho' this treaty was not ſigned 'till the twenty-ninth of November, the eſtates of Scotland were ſo ſecure there would be no objections to the terms, that the troops of the moſt diſtant counties were already marching to the general rendezvous, while the treaty was agitating. That very day the covenant was ſent to England, viz. the eighteenth of Auguſt, a proclamation was publiſhed in his Majeſty's name, according to the uſual ſtile, commanding all the ſubjects of Scotland, from ſixteen to ſixty years of age, to provide themſelves with ammunition and arms, with forty days proviſions, and to be ready to march for the kingdom's defenſe. King Charles could not bear that ſuch order ſhould be publiſhed in his name, to his ſubjects of Scotland, to arm themſelves againſt himſelf. He wrote a vehement letter to the council, commanding them expreſly to call in the proclamation; but to no purpoſe. His Majeſty ſeems not to have known, that in Scotland, as well as in England, in all ſtate-affairs, the Sovereign is never conſidered as ſeparated from the people, and that it is the uſual practiſe to iſſue all public orders in the King's name, tho' they are prejudicial to his private intereſts. Hiſtory furniſhes us with numberleſs inſtances; and Charles had, by too frequent experience, for ſome time, found in England that, in making war upon him, it was pretended to be for his honor and true intereſt. He himſelf feigned, he was carrying on war with both houſes in defenſe of the liberties of parliament. This is an effect of the government's conſtitution, whereby the King as head, and his people as the body, are deemed inſeparable. If they happen to be divided, it is not ſtrange that each pretends to act for the good of the whole, ſince this pretenſion is made the ſole cauſe of their diviſion.

Manifeſto of the Scots. P. 487, 490.

Upon this foundation it was that the eſtates of Scotland publiſhed two manifeſto's, wherein, ſuppoſing the King to have been, and ſtill to be, guided by pernicious counſels, they pretended not only, that they might juſtly aſſiſt the two houſes againſt him, but were bound in conſcience to make war upon him. They maintained, they had no other view, than to reſcue him from the dangers whereto he willingly expoſed himſelf, and to labor for his happineſs and glory. After all, this maxim is not wholly peculiar to England and Scotland: it has been followed in other ſtates, during inteſtine wars. All can be ſaid is, that many times the welfare of King and ſtate is only a cloke to ambition, revenge and other criminal paſſions: but it is not impoſſible, that what is frequently a pretenſe only, may ſome times be a very ſolid reaſon. It is the part of the wiſe and unbiaſſed, who ſeek only truth, to diſtinguiſh the real motives which ingage ſubjects to take arms againſt their Sovereigns, in ſtates where abſolute and unlimited power cannot with reaſon be aſcribed to the Prince, as in England and Scotland.

The King's anſwer. P. 494.

King Charles returned a long anſwer to theſe manifeſto's; but it was upon quite contrary ſuppoſitions. He pretended, both houſes of parliament had forced him to take arms in his own defenſe: that his conſent to the Scotiſh parliament's acts was more than ſufficient to ſecure their religion and liberties: that his ſubjects of Scotland could not, without being guilty of treaſon, make war upon him on any pretenſe whatſoever; with other ſuch like ſuppoſitions, which the Scots did not grant, as he did not thoſe made by them in ſupport of their pretended right. There is one, among others, which frequently occurs in the writers who have handled this ſubject, and which is admited, or rejected, according as they lean to either party: and this obliges me juſt to mention it, in order to arm the reader againſt the prejudices of both.

CHARLES I AN' 1643.

In the treaty of peace concluded, at London, in 1641, there was this clauſe: " That the kingdom " of Scotland ſhall not denounce nor make war " againſt the kingdom of England, or Ireland, " without conſent of the parliament of Scotland; " nor, on the other hand, the kingdom of Eng- " land make war againſt Scotland, without conſent " of the parliament of England. And in caſe any " of the ſubjects of any of the kingdom ſhall riſe " in arms, or make war againſt any other of the " kingdoms and ſubjects thereof, without conſent " of the parliament of that kingdom whereof they " are ſubjects, or upon which they do depend, that " they ſhall be held as traitors to the ſtates where- " of they are ſubjects. And that both the king- " doms, in the caſes aforeſaid, be bound to concur " in the repreſſing of thoſe who ſhall happen to riſe " in arms, or make war without conſent of their " own parliament."

Ruſhworth. Vol. IV. p. 371.

King Charles, ſuppoſing that the Scots, in aiding the parliament againſt him, intended to make war upon England, infered from this clauſe, that they were guilty of treaſon. This inference was founded not only upon the ſaid ſuppoſition, but likewiſe upon the convention of eſtates not being a true parliament, and moreover upon his having given them licenſe to meet, but with ſuch limitations as had not been obſerved. The Scots contrariwiſe ſuppoſed, that, far from intending to make war againſt England, their deſign was to aid and defend that kingdom againſt the Popiſh and prelatical party, and reſcue the King out of their hands. Thus, what King Charles ſtiled invading England, the oppoſite party termed aſſiſting it. This muſt be always remembered, when we read the hiſtory of thoſe days.

Vol. V. P. 498.

The Scotiſh army entered England January fifteen, 1643-4: but it is not yet time to touch upon what they there tranſacted. It will be neceſſary firſt to ſpeak of what paſſed concerning Ireland, and of ſome other important occurrences of the year 1643.

Affairs of Ireland.

As to Ireland, the ſucceſs of the firſt campain had been ſo equal on both ſides, that neither could boaſt of having gained any great advantage. The point was to continue the war; each rightly judging, that peace would be always very remote, while matters remained in a ſtate of equality: and therefore both King and parliament thought of ſtrengthening themſelves againſt the inſuing campain. The Oxford treaty not ſucceeding, as was eaſy to foreſee, his Majeſty ſtudied means to imploy at home the Engliſh troops which ſerved in Ireland, and in order thereto, of making a truce with the rebels. As this notable project could not but be odious to the Engliſh, and render ſuſpicious all this Prince's proteſtations touching the Iriſh rebellion, he ſaw himſelf obliged to uſe more caution, to procure ſome plauſible excuſe to conclude ſuch ceſſation. This he did by ingaging the lords-juſtices of Ireland, and the council of Dublin, to countenance his project. But, as I may be accuſed of aſcribing to the King motives he never had, I think it incumbent on me to allege here the unqueſtionable teſtimony of lord Clarendon. The reader will find it in Vol. II. p. 318. Fol. Edit. viz.

Charles forms the project of making a truce with the Iriſh. Cox. Part. II. p. 130. Borlace. p. 112, &c.

" The King was not all this while without a due " ſenſe of the dangers threatened him, in the growth " and improvement of the power and ſtrength

" of

Charles I An' 1643.

" of the enemy, and how impoſſible it would be " for him, without ſome more extraordinary aſſi- " ſtance, to reſiſt that torrent, which he foreſaw " by the next ſpring would be ready to overwhelm " him, if he made not proviſion accordingly. " And finding by degrees, that it was not in his " power to compoſe the diſturbances of England, " or to prevent thoſe of Scotland, and abhoring " the thought of introducing a foreign nation to " ſubdue his own ſubjects, he began to think of " expedients which might allay the diſtempers in " Ireland; that ſo, having one of his kingdoms in " peace, he might apply the power of that towards " the procuring it in his other dominions. He " was not ignorant, how tender an argument that " buſineſs of Ireland was, and how prepared men " were to pervert whatſoever he ſaid, or did in it; " and therefore he reſolved to proceed with that " caution, that whatſoever was done in it, ſhould " be by the council of that ſtate, who were under- " ſtood to be moſt ſkilful in thoſe affairs."

Hence it is manifeſt, that King Charles's deſign in making a truce with the Iriſh rebels, was to imploy the Engliſh forces, ſerving in that kingdom, to ſubdue the parliament, and that, to avoid the reproaches which might be caſt on him for it, he reſolved ſo to manage that it ſhould appear to be done by the council of Ireland, that is, by the lords-juſtices, and the reſt of the council. In this paſſage I have quoted, lord Clarendon inſinuates, that his Majeſty came not to this reſolution 'till about the end of 1643, i. e. when he was ſure the Scots were to ſend an army into England. For, after relating what had paſſed during the campain of 1643, the parliament's negociations in Scotland, the covenant of both kingdoms, the reſolution taken in Scotland to aid the two houſes, calling the Oxford parliament, which was not done 'till December the ſame year, he finally comes to ſpeak of Charles's reſolution, to make uſe of the Engliſh troops which ſerved in Ireland. " The King (ſays " he) was not all this while without a due ſenſe " of the dangers which threatened him, and how " impoſſible it would be for him to reſiſt that " torrent, which he foreſaw by the next ſpring " would be ready to overwhelm him.——He " began therefore to think of expedients which " might allay the diſtempers of Ireland." It is however certain that his Majeſty determined on making a truce in Ireland long before the parliament's negociation with Scotland, and before the Scots reſolution to levy an army. And what invincibly proves Charles's being reſolved before the ingagement of the Scots, is, that the Iriſh truce was ſigned the fifteenth of September 1643, after a long negociation. Thus, lord Clarendon's inſinuation, that the King did reſolve to imploy the Engliſh forces of Ireland, only to ſecure himſelf againſt the torrent which was ready to overwhelm him, being very ill-grounded, confirms what will be ſeen hereafter, that he was not induced by neceſſity to make a truce with the Iriſh rebels, but by the hopes of ſubduing the parliament with theſe additional forces.

His Majeſty's pretenſe to conclude this truce.

To have a pretenſe to conclude this truce, Charles judged the beſt way was to perſuade the public, it would be extremely advantageous, or rather was abſolutely neceſſary, to the Engliſh in Ireland, and their ſole refuge, to preſerve what they ſtill poſſeſſed in that iſland. He had more than once complained, that the parliament neglected the Iriſh war, and would have had a numerous army ſent thither. But, as I have already obſerved, that the parliament, ſuſpecting his drift was only to weaken them by that diverſion, were contented with ſending from time to time a few ſupplies to continue the war, beſide the Scotiſh troops, which made a great diverſion in the North. Theſe ſupplies, tho' inconſiderable, had however produced this good effect, that the rebels, inſtead of making greater progreſs, had on the contrary loſt much ground, after ſeveral defeats: yet were they abundantly ſuperior to the Engliſh; and tho' the Engliſh and Scotiſh forces were in ſome ſort able to curb them, they were not however ſtrong enough to hope reducing them to obedience: nay, it was to be feared, they would in the end be overpowered with numbers, eſpecially as the parliament, ingaged in a war with his Majeſty, could not ſend a powerful aid into Ireland, for fear of leaving England unprovided. This was the pretenſe Charles made uſe of to conclude a truce with the rebels.

Charles I An' 1643.

Perplexity of the lords-juſtices of Ireland.

In the poſture of affairs ſince war had been declared between King and parliament, the lords-juſtices who governed Ireland were greatly imbaraſſed. They had been commiſſioned by his Majeſty, and conſequently from him they were to receive their orders. But on the other hand, the parliament having taken upon them to pay the charges of the Iriſh war, they could not openly declare for the King, without forfeiting all aſſiſtance from the parliament, Charles not being in condition to ſupply their neceſſities. A neutrality was not any how practicable, becauſe his Majeſty's and the parliament's intereſt being oppoſite, they could not implicitely obey the one, without being ſuſpected by the other. They choſe therefore to indeavor contenting both, as far as poſſible, and the rather, as King and parliament equally expreſſed a longing deſire to terminate the troubles of Ireland. But they could not remain long in this ſituation: ſuch was their caſe at laſt, that it was not poſſible for them to pleaſe both. The parliament having above a year ſince ſent to Dublin a commitee, to aſſiſt the council, and ſetle with the lord-juſtices what concerned continuing the war (1), theſe commiſſioners were at firſt received with reſpect; but, in February 1643, by the King's expreſs order, were ſent back to England. Charles was well pleaſed, the parliament ſhould ſupply what was neceſſary for carrying on the war, but unwilling they ſhould have any ſhare in the government of Ireland, or their commiſſioners a place in the council of ſtate. Not long after, he removed ſome of the lords-juſtices and counſellors (2). Probably, he was then forming the project of a truce with the rebels, and wanted for that purpoſe that the lords-juſtices, and all the counſellors ſhould be diſpoſed to act only by his orders: beſide, on this ſuppoſition, the parliament's commiſſioners could not but be a great impediment, had they continued to aſſiſt at the council of ſtate. From that time alſo, the lords-juſtices inſtances to his Majeſty, and the parliament, for aid, became more preſſing and frequent. They repreſented the ſtate of the Engliſh in Ireland as utterly deſperate, without a ſpeedy ſupply of men, money and ammunition. They ſaid, the officers were very importunate for leave to return to England. In a word, they forgot nothing might create a belief that matters were at the ultimate extremity. On the other hand, ſome officers of the Engliſh army preſented a remonſtrance to the lords-juſtices, April the fourth, 1643, declaring, they were reduced to deſpair for want of money to ſubſiſt, and that it ought not to be thought ſtrange if, in their caſe, they ſhould have recourſe to the firſt and primary law of nature, wherewith God hath indowed all living creatures, viz. the law of ſelf-preſervation. If to theſe ſo earneſt complaints be added what lord Clarendon ſays, that the King reſolved ſo to proceed, that every thing ſhould appear to be done by the council of Ireland, the ſending back the parliament's commiſſioners, and the changes made among the lords-juſtices, and members of the council, one can ſcarce help ſuſpecting theſe complaints to be all begged, purpoſely to ſerve for pretenſe to the ceſſation. This ſuſpicion ſeems the more probable, as at that time the affairs of the Engliſh in Ireland were on a very good footing, and as the marquis of Ormond had juſt gained, at Roſs, a ſignal victory over the rebels. Accordingly the lords-juſtices, as well as the officers, took care not to make the rebels progreſs the ground of their complaints, but only the want of money, proviſions and ammunition.

Charles impowers Ormond to treat with the rebels. April 23. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 537. Borlace, p. 115. * For one year.

Be this ſo or otherwiſe, this remonſtrance of the officers being ſent to his Majeſty, he thence took occaſion to ſend Ormond a commiſſion, impowering him to treat with the rebels, and agree with them upon a ceſſation *. This he notified to the lords-juſtices, in a letter, dated April the twenty-third, 1643, commanding them to aſſiſt that marquis in the execution of his commiſſion, to the utmoſt of their power. The date of this commiſſion is not a little obſervable; for it evidently ſhews, that the Scots reſolution to aſſiſt the parliament, which was not taken 'till the inſuing Auguſt, did not occaſion this truce with the Iriſh rebels.

The lords-juſtices very urgent for aid. May 11. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 538. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 320.

The third of May, Charles renewed his orders to Ormond concerning the truce. But before the marquis had received theſe freſh orders, the lords-juſtices had written to his Majeſty, on the eleventh ditto, in very expreſſive terms, repreſenting the wretched ſtate of Ireland; intimating, that they were all reduced to deſpair for want of money and proviſions, tho' 'till then the Engliſh forces had been not a little ſucceſsful againſt the rebels.

Charles ſends their preſſing letter to the parliament: June 16. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 539——544.

Charles, who meaned to take advantage from this letter, to demonſtrate to the public the neceſſity of ſuch ceſſation as he was concluding, ſent it to both houſes, who immediately took into conſideration this affair. A commitee was appointed, with orders to think of ways to raiſe money for Ireland. On this commitee's report, the parliament reſolved to raiſe money by voluntary contributions, and offered very advantageous terms, to ſuch as ſhould advance the ſums required (1). But and diſpatches freſh orders concerning the ceſſation. p. 544, 545. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 323. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 547.

notwithſtanding this, July the ſecond, Charles diſpatched freſh orders to the lords-juſtices, and the marquis of Ormond, to conclude a truce for one year, which they were already laboring. From the twentieth of June, the general council of the Iriſh, aſſembled at Kilkenny, had granted a commiſſion to treat.

September the ſeventh, King Charles repeated his orders to the marquis of Ormond, to conclude the truce as ſoon as poſſible. At the ſame time, he ordered him to ſend into England all ſuch Engliſh troops as could be ſpared after the truce ſhould be concluded. His reaſon was, and he could juſtly ſay it then, that an army was preparing in Scotland to invade England: but there was not any mention of that article in the preceding orders.

The truce ſigned. P. 548.

At length, the ceſſation was ſigned the fifteenth of September, on condition, that both parties ſhould retain what they then poſſeſſed. Charles founded the neceſſity thereof; firſt, on a remonſtrance preſented him, December the firſt, 1642, by four colonels, as well in their own, as in the names of many other officers, who ſerved in the army of Ireland, wherein they told him, it was impoſſible for them to ſubſiſt any longer, if means were not found to ſupply their preſſing wants: ſecondly, on the repeated letters ſent from the lords-juſtices to King and parliament, ſince January 1642-3, wherein they ſaid, the army was going to periſh in few days, for want of aſſiſtance: thirdly, on the officers ſaid later remonſtrance, of the fourth of April, wherein they pretended, a few hours delay to aſſiſt them would be too long (2). Nevertheleſs, this army, which was reduced to extremity the firſt of December, 1642, found means to ſubſiſt 'till the fifteenth of September 1643, tho' the lords-juſtices complained, they had received no ſupplies ſince November. This is a clear evidence, that all theſe complaints were greatly agravated by private directions from his Majeſty, whoſe meaning was to uſe them for pretenſe to the ceſſation. This is what the parliament repreſented in a declaration, publiſhed on account of the Iriſh truce, before they had notice of its being concluded. They complained in very ſtrong terms, that they were never acquainted by the ſtates of Ireland with the treaty of a ceſſation, much leſs was their advice demanded, notwithſtanding that, by act of parliament, and by his Majeſty's commiſſion under the great-ſeal, both houſes were 'to adviſe, order and diſpoſe of all things "concerning the government and defenſe of that "kingdom.' They ſaid, that to accompliſh more eaſily this diſhonorable ceſſation, thoſe of the ſtate in Dublin, who were ſo honeſt and religious as to diſſuade it, were firſt diſcountenanced, and at laſt put out of their places, and reſtrained to priſon, as ſir William Parſons, one of the lords juſtices; ſir John Temple, maſter of the Rolls; ſir Adam Loftus, vice-treaſurer of Ireland; and ſir Robert Meredith, likewiſe one of the council. That it was made only with a view to diſcourage thoſe who had ſubſcribed to advance money upon the parliament's propoſals, in order to render impoſſible the maintenance of the army in Ireland, and to imploy it in England, to the deſtruction of the parliament. For theſe, and many other reaſons, which I omit to avoid prolixity, both houſes declared the intended ceſſation void, promiſing to indemnify thoſe who ſhould refuſe ſubmiting thereto (3).

Both houſes complain of it. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 555. Clarendon, Vol. II: p. 323.

Mean while Charles, who was aſſured of the concurrence of the lords-juſtices, the council of ſtate, and the marquis of Ormond, general of the army, ſo managed that, on concluding this truce, all the Engliſh troops which could be ſpared were ſent him over. Theſe forces landed at Moſtyn, in Flintſhire, and their firſt attempt was upon Hawarden-caſtle, which was ſurrendered to them the fourth of December. Then they took ſome other ſmall places in Cheſhire (4); after which lord Byron, who commanded for the King in thoſe parts, beſieged Nantwich, January the fifteenth, 1643-4. Three days after, making a ſudden and violent ſtorm on five different parts of the town at once, he was every where repulſed with the loſs of many of his men. At length, the twenty-firſt ditto, lord Fairfax, who advanced to relieve the town, intirely routed the Iriſh army, conſiſting of three thouſand foot (who were almoſt all ſlain or taken priſoners) and eighteen hundred horſe, moſt of whom eſcaped by flight, but were ſo diſperſed that they could not do his Majeſty any farther ſervice. Colonel George Monk was taken in this action, and ſent priſoner to the Tower of London, where he remained ſome time, 'till he finally took arms under the parliament (1). Thus King Charles received no advantage by theſe troops; nay, they rather did him great prejudice, in that, by all his proceedings to procure them, he confirmed the miſtruſt entertained by many of his being concerned in the Iriſh rebellion.

Several events of the year 1643.

To avoid interrupting the thread of military actions, and of what paſſed in Scotland and Ireland, I have been conſtrained to paſs over diverſe important events of this year 1643, whereof it will be neceſſary to make ſome mention, tho' without any connection, as they are of a different nature. The reader, by obſerving the dates, may readily perceive their relation to the general affairs. I ſhall begin with certain projects framed at London, to compel the parliament to make peace, while both armies were in the field.

A plot to force the parliament to a peace.

King Charles was ever ſtrongly poſſeſſed with the notion, that fear alone held moſt people attached to the parliament, and that if he procured them a good opportunity to hold up their heads, he ſhould oblige both houſes to make a ſpeedy peace, without demanding ſecurities, which made the principal obſtacle. This was Charles's favorite ſcheme, as well as of his miniſters, his council, his friends and adherents, in London and elſewhere; and this was the ſpring of ſeveral projects to force the parliament to a peace. It would indeed be very ſtrange, that ſo many able men ſhould be of this opinion, without any manner of foundation. But, on the other hand, one knows not what to think, when it is conſidered that, of ſo many projects grounded upon this ſuppoſition, not one ſucceeded, which ſeems to argue that the majority of people were not for his Majeſty. Howſoever this be, it is certain, Charles had many friends in London, and in the parliament itſelf, who ſerved him artfully, by pretending to dread that the war would be deſtructive to the parliament; and thereby they aimed at infuſing a real terror into the people, and gradually diſpoſing them to wiſh and ſue for peace. Theſe men inceſſantly labored to ſow diſcord between parliament and people. As it was neceſſary for them to hold private correſpondence with the court, in order to act according to directions, his Majeſty ſent frequent meſſengers to London, ſometimes ſecretly, othertimes openly, under color of bringing meſſages to the parliament, in order to convey his inſtructions to his friends, and be exactly informed of what paſſed in both houſes, and the city. With this view, in December 1642, he publiſhed for the Londoners ſakes, as was pretended, a proclamation for the free and ſafe paſſage of all goods, wares and merchandizes to the city. But the commons, ſuſpecting ſome hidden myſtery under this condeſcenſion, did, in the inſuing month, paſs two orders; one, That no carriers or waggoners would be permited to go to Oxford, or elſewhere, without ſpecial licenſe from the parliament: the other, that any agent or ſervant to a perſon in arms againſt the parliament, who ſhould preſume to enter Weſtminſter, or reſide about London, ſhould be forthwith apprehend as a ſpy. The tenth of April following, theſe orders were renewed, and even extended to all perſons who ſhould come from the King's quarters to London without a ſafe-conduct, and the ſame was printed and publiſhed.

p. 314.

To all appearance, his Majeſty, who had ſo many correſpondents in London, was not ignorant of this order. Nevertheleſs, on pretenſe it was not ſignified to him in form, he ſent a meſſage to the parliament with an offer of peace in general terms, without demanding a paſs: for the bearer. But the commons, reſolving to ſtop the courſe of theſe artifices, which ſerved to carry on Charles's private correſpondence in London, ordered the meſſenger to be ſent to priſon, for coming without a ſafe-conduct. Three days after, to ſhew the people that his Majeſty vainly amuſed them with hopes of a peace, they impeached the Queen of high-treaſon, and ſent up the impeachment to their lordſhips, by mr. Pym. Charles, full of indignation at this extraordinary proceeding, iſſued a proclamation, to forbid obedience to the orders of both houſes; declaring, he acknowledged them no longer for houſes of parliament.

Affairs were in this poſture, when both houſes diſcovered a conſpiracy formed in London, always under color of procuring peace, refuſed by the parliament. I ſhall give the particulars of this conſpiracy, as they were communicated by mr. Pym to the peers, at a conference between the two houſes. He told them;

"I. That the conſpiracy was formed of a mixture and conjunction of perſons of ſeveral qualities, ſome whereof were of both houſes of parliament, others of the city, and others belonging to the court, who in their reſpective places and imployments were to form and perfect the work, raiſed out of the aſhes of the late petition of London for peace.

"II. The chief actors were mr. Waller, a member of the houſe of commons, who pretended, and gave out to the reſt, that many others of that houſe, and of the lords, were privy to and concerned therein; mr. Tompkins, a gentleman living in Holborn, brother-in-law to the ſaid mr. Waller, and a ſervant to the Queen, as being ſecretary to the commiſſioners for her Majeſty's revenue; mr. Challoner, a noted citizen; one mr. Blinkard; mr. Alexander Hampden, who brought the laſt meſſage from the King; mr. Haſſel, one of his Majeſty's meſſengers, &c.

"III. The method was, for ſeveral perſons in the city to diſpoſe themſelves into a commitee, to hold intelligence with both armies, the court, and the parliament, to take a general ſurvey of the affections of all the inhabitants within the weekly bills of mortality, which was to be done under theſe three ranks, 'right men,' (or of the King's party) 'averſe men,' (or the well-affected to the parliament) and 'moderate men,' (or neutrals;) to conſider of arms, ammunition, and all proviſions of war, to appoint out of themſelves ſelect perſons to treat with mr. Waller and mr. Tompkins in relation to the city, court and parliament; as alſo with ſir Nicholas Criſp, ſir George Binion, captain Roydon, and others at Oxford.

"IV. Mr. Waller's province was, to ingage a conſiderable part of the lords and commons, and to be a means of conveying counſels, reſolutions and intelligence between them and the ſaid city-commitee. Mr. Tompkins was not only an aſſiſtant to mr. Waller therein, but an inſtrument to convey, by Haſſel and others, their proceedings to the court, principally to lord Falkland, and to receive thence directions, powers and commands.

(1) Among the priſoners were taken a hundred and twenty Iriſh women with long knives, wherewith they were ſaid to have done miſchief. This fight was reported to be as ſharp, for the time, as any had happened before in thoſe wars. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 302.

" V. For preventing diſcovery, proteſtations " of ſecreſy were taken, as they were Chriſtians, " not to diſcloſe it, and no man in the city was to " indeavor the ingaging above two, whereby no " one man could impeach many.

" VI. From the court, mr. Heron and mr. " Alexander Hampden, and others imployed " upon meſſages from the King to the parlia- " ment were to convey directions, incourage- " ments and advice to thoſe in London, and " authority was to be given under the great- " ſeal, and warrants under the King's hand, for " ſetling a council of war, naming generals and " other officers, execution of martial law, raiſing " money and providing arms; and, to facilitate " the whole, part of the King's forces to be in " readineſs to aſſiſt the party here, as there ſhould " be occaſion.

" VII. The particulars of the deſign itſelf were, " to ſeize the King's children, to ſecure ſeveral " members of parliament, particularly lord Say, " lord Wharton, mr. Pym, ſir Philip Stapleton, " colonel Hampden, and colonel Strode, as alſo " the lord-mayor and commitee of the militia, " under pretenſe of bringing them to a legal " trial; to ſeize upon the out-works, forts, ma- " gazines, gates and other places of importance " in the city, with the Tower, and let in the " King's forces, and in the mean time to reſiſt " and obſtruct all payments, impoſed by autho- " rity of the two houſes for ſupport of their " armies.

" VIII. For their authority, they had the fol- " lowing commiſſion brought up by lady Aubigny " (who was under cuſtody) the ſaid commiſſion " being found hid under ground in mr. Tomp- " kins's cellar.

" IX. In purſuance of this commiſſion, they had " often conſulted of a general, and treated of " his buſineſs with ſir Hugh Pollard, priſoner in " the Compter, once a member of the houſe of " commons, but expelled, being accuſed of having " a hand in the deſign to bring up the Northern " army againſt the parliament. And a declara- " tion was ready drawn, ſeting forth the cauſe of " their taking up of arms to be in purſuance of " their late proteſtation; to maintain the true " reformed Proteſtant religion againſt all Papiſts " and Sectaries; to oppoſe illegal aſſeſſments, &c. " which was to be diſtributed to their friends, " and, on the night of their riſing, ſet upon the " poſts round about London. Concerning which " time of their riſing they had alſo conſulted (of " which preciſe notice was to be ſent to Oxford, " as to the day and hour) and ſome moved to " have it done on Wedneſday, the laſt of May " (being the faſt-day, and the very next day " after the firſt intimation was given towards a " diſcovery) but it had been put off, and not fully " concluded; it being ſaid, 'it ſhould be left to " the lords to determine,' who Waller pretended " ſhould ſide with them. Mr. Haſſel lay cloſe " at Beaconsfield, and had word ſent, 'the great " ſhip was come in the Downs,' by which he " was to underſtand, that the deſign was near " ripe; and he acquainted lord Falkland at " Oxford therewith, and received anſwer, that " they ſhould haſten it with all ſpeed, and when " they were ready, three thouſand of the King's " forces were to advance, from Oxford, within " fifteen miles of London, to be ready upon no- " tice to fall into the works, and aſſiſt; and " white ribbons or tape was agreed to be worn by " all concerned in this action, to diſtinguiſh them."

CHARLES I AN' 1643.

Lord Clarendon, who is very diffuſe upon this conſpiracy, denies neither the plot itſelf, nor the King's commiſſion, brought to London by lady Aubigny (1); but urges, that the parliament confounded in one ſingle plot two different projects; the firſt formed by Waller, Tompkins and Challoner, who were at London; and the other by ſir Nicholas Criſp, who, being recorder of London (2), had been impriſoned, and eſcaping had retired to Oxford. Mighty well: but whether there were two plots or one, it is no leſs apparent, that King Charles's deſign was to compel the parliament to a peace, and that his repeated meſſages to both houſes, with offers of peace, were frequently but artifices to carry on his correſpondence in London.

Vol. II. p. 194.

This diſcovery cauſed both houſes to reſolve on uniting themſelves ſtill more ſtrictly together, by a new covenant or oath, tendered to all the members, and afterwards to the army, and ſuch of the people as were willing to take it. Tompkins, Challoner, and two others were hanged. But Waller ſaved his life, paying a fine of ten thouſand pounds, and was baniſhed the kingdom. Hampden died in priſon before his ſentence, and Haſſel died likewiſe the night before his trial. The ill ſucceſs of this ſcheme prevented not the like from being contrived in the ſucceeding Auguſt.

Oath agreed on by the two houſes. June 6. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 325——330. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 198, 199, 200.

Since the miſcarriage of Waller's conſpiracy, Charles had a train of ſucceſſes, which revived the courage of his friends at London, who were near deſponding. Lord Fairfax was defeated at Atherton, in Yorkſhire. The Queen was got to her conſort, with a conſiderable ſupply. Waller was intirely routed at Roundway-down; and his Majeſty, now maſter of Briſtol, was preparing to attack Gloceſter. Thus, crowned with ſucceſs, he judged this a favorable opportunity to force the parliament to a peace, and all his London friends began to imploy their beſt efforts. Whether this project had its riſe at court, or Charles had only approved it, he believed it requiſite to prepare peoples minds by a public declaration, to this purport: viz.

New plot. Auguſt.

" As the grievances and loſſes of no particular " perſons could be compared to the damage he " himſelf ſuſtained; ſo a peace could not be ſo " welcome to any man as to him. God Almighty " knew with what unwillingneſs, and anguiſh of " ſoul, he ſubmited to the neceſſity of taking up " defenſive arms: and the world knew, with what " juſtice and bounty he had repaired his ſubjects, for " all the preſſures they had borne, by ſuch excellent " laws, as would for ever have prevented the like; " and with what earneſtneſs he deſired to add any " thing for the eſtabliſhment of the religion, laws " and liberty of the kingdom; all which had " been evidently invaded by thoſe who had ſa- " crificed the public good to their own ends. He " well remembered the proteſtation made by him, " at the head of his army, 'to defend and main- " tain the true reformed Proteſtant religion, and Charles's declaration after his ſucceſſes, to prepare the people. p. 233.

(1) This lady, with the conſent of both houſes, went to Oxford, to tranſact her own affairs with the King, upon the death of her huſband, who was killed at Edge-hill, and having done her buſineſs, and being ready to return, ſhe was deſired by the King, to carry a ſmall box (in which was put the commiſſion) to London, and deliver it to one who ſhould come for it with ſuch a token, which ſhe did accordingly, not knowing what ſhe carried. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 195. Ludlow (Vol. I. p. 82.) ſays, She brought the commiſſion made up in the hair of her head.

Charles I An' 1643.

" if it ſhould pleaſe God to bleſs his arms with " ſucceſs, he would maintain the juſt privileges and " freedom of parliament, and govern by the known " laws of the land, for whoſe defenſe only that " army was raiſed.' And there could not be a more " ſeaſonable time to renew that proteſtation than " now, when God had vouchſafed him ſo many victo- " ries, which would hinder him from falling under " the ſcandalous imputation, that his meſſages of " peace proceeded from the weakneſs of his power, " not love of his people. He declared therefore to " all the world, in the preſenſe of God, that he was " ſo far from intending any alteration of the reli- " gion eſtabliſhed, in which he was born and " bred, and would reſolutely die, or from the " leaſt thought of invading the liberty and pro- " perty of the ſubject, or violating the juſt privi- " leges of parliament, that the preſervation of the " eſtabliſhed religion, the laws, the liberties of " his people, and the juſt privileges of parlia- " ment, ſhould be equally his care, as the main- " tenance of his own rights. Whether thoſe who " were enemies to the eſtabliſhed eccleſiaſtical " government, who perſecuted the learned, ortho- " dox miniſters, and put into their places igno- " rant, ſeditious and ſchiſmatical preachers, who " vilified the book of Common-prayer, and pro- " fained God's worſhip, were like to advance " religion: whether thoſe who, without the leaſt " ſhadow of law, impoſed exorbitant taxes upon " their fellow ſubjects, impriſoned, tormented " and murdered them, were like to preſerve the " liberty and property of the ſubject: and whe- " ther thoſe who had invaded the juſt rights of the " crown, denied the King his negative voice, " awed and terrified the members of both houſes, " were like to vindicate the privileges of parlia- " ment, all the world might judge," Finally, after ſundry invectives againſt the two houſes, he concluded with ſaying: " Whoſoever have been " miſ-led by thoſe whoſe hearts, from the begin- " ing, have deſigned all this miſchief, and ſhall re- " deem their paſſed crimes by their preſent ſervice " and loyalty, in the apprehending or oppoſing " ſuch who ſhall continue to bear arms againſt us, " and ſhall uſe their utmoſt indeavors to reduce " thoſe men to their due obedience, and to reſtore " the kingdom to its wonted peace, ſhall have " cauſe to magnify our mercy, and to repent the " treſpaſſes commited againſt ſo juſt and gracious " a Sovereign. (1).

It eaſy to perceive that, by this declaration, and eſpecially by its concluſion, Charles's aim was to excite and authoriſe an inſurrection in London againſt both houſes, and what happened preſently after puts it abſolutely beyond all doubt. This declaration was therefore preparative for the execution of a plot, to compel the parliament to a peace. Undoubtedly, King Charles was really deſirous of peace: but it muſt be always remembered what peace it was he ſo earneſtly wiſhed. It was a peace which ſhould re-inveſt him with all his prerogatives, after which he promiſed to govern according to the known laws of the land. But in this promiſe lay the whole difficulty of a peace; the parliament pretending it could not be relied on, and this Prince offering no other ſecurity than his word, tacitly ſuppoſing it a crime to call in queſtion his ſincerity.

The houſe of lords propoſe ſending to his Majeſty offers of peace. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 245.

No ſooner was this declaration publiſhed, than the King's friends began their uſual artifices in London. They affected being in extraordinary terror, on account of the proſperous ſucceſs of his Majeſty's arms, and inſinuated, that the conſequences ſhould be prevented by a pacification. But, as the example of Tompkins and Challoner had effectually terrified the King's moſt devoted friends, not one dared openly expoſe himſelf to the ſame danger. It was therefore reſolved among them, that the houſe of lords ſhould firſt break the ice, and propoſe to the commons a peace, which ſhould be ſeconded by the King's friends in London. The upper-houſe conſiſted but of few peers, ſome of whom were either openly or privately for the King: others were his enemies; and ſome were ready to follow the ſtream, which way ſoever it carried them. Theſe latter were thoſe whom Charles's party ſtrove to gain by various means, in order to be ſuperior in the houſe of lords, ſome by promiſes, others by threats, and ſome again by way of perſuaſion, intimating to them the abſolute neceſſity of a peace. In ſhort, they ſecured a majority of voices in the upper-houſe: not that all on whom they prevailed directly promiſed being abſolutely at his Majeſty's devotion; that was not the point, but only to agree that a peace ſhould be propoſed by their houſe, which could not be otherwiſe conſidered than as a propoſal very innocent. The managers of this ſcheme took care not to propoſe peace without ſome ſuch terms as Charles preciſely required: doing otherwiſe alone had been ſufficient to make them loſe ſeveral of thoſe they had gained. They had only to ingage the commons to enter into negociation, after which, they hoped the ſuperiority his Majeſty then had, ſupported with the indeavors of his party, would be capable to remove ſuch difficulties as might occur in the principal articles. This reſolution taken, their lordſhips deſired a conference with the commons, whereat they declared, that they had determined on ſending to his Majeſty propoſitions of peace, and hoped the commons would concur with them. The propoſitions were:

Propoſitions for peace by the peers. Auguſt 5. Ibid.

" 1. That both armies might be preſently diſ- " banded, and his Majeſty be intreated to return " to his parliament, upon ſuch ſecurity as ſhould " give him ſatisfaction.

" 2. That religion might be ſetled with the " advice of a ſynod of divines, in ſuch a manner " as his Majeſty, with the conſent of both houſes " of parliament, ſhould appoint.

" 3. That the militia, both by ſea and land, " might be ſetled by a bill; and the militia, forts " and ſhips of the kingdom, put into ſuch hands " as the King ſhould appoint, with the approba- " tion of both houſes of parliament: and his Ma- " jeſty's revenue to be abſolutely and wholly re- " ſtored unto him; only deducting ſuch part as " had been, of neceſſity, expended for the main- " tenance of his children, and not otherwiſe.

" 4. That all the members of both houſes, who " had been expelled only for abſenting themſelves, " or mere compliance with his Majeſty, and no " other matter of fact againſt them, might be " reſtored to their places.

" 5. That all delinquents, from before the tenth " day of January 1641, ſhould be delivered up " to the juſtice of parliament, and a general par- " don for all others on both ſides.

" 6. And laſtly, that there might be an act of " oblivion for all by-gone deeds, and acts of ho- " ſtility."

Very poſſibly, thoſe who had got theſe propoſitions paſſed in the houſe of peers, did not themſelves

(1) Adding, " We deſire all our good ſubjects, who have really wiſhed us well, now God has done ſuch wonderful things " for us, vigorouſly to indeavor to put an end to all theſe miſeries, by bringing in men, money, plate, horſes, or arms, to " our aid, that ſo we being not wanting to ourſelves, may with confidence expect the continuance of God's favor, to reſtore us " all to that bleſſed harmony of affection, which may eſtabliſh a firm peace."

CHARLES I AN' 1643.

ſelves believe a peace could be made on theſe foundations. The difficulties which occured in the three firſt propoſitions had been frequently debated, both before and ſince the war commenced, without any poſſibility of coming to a concluſion. It was therefore unlikely that King Charles would, in his proſperity, grant what he had denied when his affairs were not in ſo promiſing a ſituation. But, as I hinted, they who managed this contrivance, aimed only at procuring a negociation; perſuaded as they were that, by their intereſt and cabals, or by the peoples riſing, they ſhould get theſe points decided in his Majeſty's favor. For that reaſon, the chief propoſition, viz. the third concerning the militia, which the parliament had always fully explained, was expreſſed in a very general and ambiguous manner, in theſe terms, "That the "militia might de ſetled by a bill."

The commons in a fright conſent to the propoſitions. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 246.

The commons perfectly ſaw what was the aim of thoſe who projected theſe propoſitions, and were thereat not a little terrified. The houſe was apprehenſive, that they were but too powerfully ſupported; otherwiſe, it was not likely they ſhould have taken ſuch a ſtep, when a commitee was already gone to deſire aſſiſtance from the Scots. It was therefore, after a long debate, reſolved by a majority, that the propoſitions ſhould be tranſmited to his Majeſty. Very ſeemingly, this reſolution was taken merely to amuſe Charles's friends, and to gain time, in order more eaſily to diſconcert their meaſures: ſince the lord-mayor of London, attended with a croud of people, came next day to the lower houſe, whereof he was a member, and delivered a petition from the common-council, wherein the houſe was requeſted to perſiſt in their former reſolutions, and reject their lordſhips propoſitions. The lord-mayor withal affirmed, that the Londoners were ready to exert their utmoſt towards a vigorous proſecution of the war. Whereupon the houſe reſumed courage, and reverſed the preceding day's reſolves. Thus his Majeſty's partiſans were in their turn greatly imbaraſſed, and under a neceſſity of taking new meaſures. The expedient they deviſed was to make the women riſe, in hopes that ſuch a ſtrange inſurrection might produce one more important, and occaſion ſome revolution.

The womens tumult. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 357.

Auguſt the ninth, a petition for peace was preſented to the commons by two or three thouſand women *. The conditions by them propoſed were preciſely thoſe which Charles had always offered. A general anſwer being ſent them, they were not ſatisfied, and their number by noon increaſing to five thouſand, they came to the door of the houſe, crying "Peace! Peace! give us thoſe traitors who are "againſt peace, that we maytear them to pieces; give "us that dog Pym." Part of the trained-bands (who uſually ſtood centinel there) firing upon them with powder only, to fright them, they laughed at it, and finding a heap of brickbats in the yard, threw them at thoſe centinels, whom they made ſcamper. Some companies of ſoldiers being at length ſent for, they, after uſing fair means in vain, drew and cut them over their hands and faces. A ballad-ſinger was killed on the ſpot (1), and another woman loſt her noſe, whereof it was ſaid ſhe afterwards died. They finally all diſperſed. Lord Clarendon affirms, they were the wives of ſubſtantial citizens; which is ſcarcely credible (2). Thus ended the grand project of forcing the parliament to a peace; a project wherein means was found to ingage diverſe peers, and many commoners, under color that a peace was neceſſary to the ſtate. Nothing could be truer; but care was taken not to diſcover to them that, on pretenſe of laboring for the public, the King's advantage only was really aimed at.

CHARLES I AN' 1643.

Character of the earl of Eſſex.

The earl of Eſſex was of their number who moſt wiſhed for peace; but not ſuch a peace as the court and its adherents were ſeeking. Theſe were for peace, and uſed their utmoſt indeavors to procure it: but it was ſuch a one as King Charles offered, i. e. a peace founded only upon his word. Eſſex deemed it not impracticable, in concluding a peace, to find neceſſary ſecurities for the nation's liberties: as appears in his letter to the ſpeaker (dated July the ninth) wherein, after the deſcription of Chalgrave-field: he ſays, "If it were thought fit to ſend to "his Majeſty to have peace, with the ſetling of "religion, the laws and liberties of the ſubject, "and to bring unto juſt trial thoſe chief delinquents "who have brought all this miſchief to both king-"doms; and (as my lord of Briſtol ſpake once "in parliament) how we may be ſecured to have "theſe things performed hereafter; or elſe, if his "Majeſty ſhall pleaſe to abſent himſelf, there may "be a day ſet down to give a period to all theſe "unhappy diſtractions by a battle, which, when "and where they ſhall chuſe, that may be "thought any way indifferent, I ſhall be ready to "perform that duty I owe you; and the propo-"ſitions, to be agreed upon between his Majeſty "and the parliament, may be ſent to ſuch an in-"different place, that both armies may be drawn "near the one to the other; that if peace be not "concluded, it may be ended by the ſword."

His letter to the ſpeaker. July 9. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 291.

This, moſt apparently, is not the language of a man propoſing a peace to gratify the King, and ſolely with intent to procure a negociation whence his Majeſty might reap ſome advantage; but of one who heartily wiſhed for ſuch a peace as might put a happy period to the kingdom's diſtractions; or, if that could not be by means of a peace, to end them at leaſt by a battle. He was doubtleſs of opinion, that the nation would run leſs hazard by venturing a deciſion by arms, than by continuing the war. Nothing better demonſtrates the uprightneſs of his intentions: but few in thoſe days were of a like diſpoſition. King Charles likewiſe paſſionately wiſhed for peace; but it was on condition he ſhould be no loſer by it; that he ſhould be reſtored to all his rights, and his word relied on for what was to come. Touching religion, all he would yield was, that the Preſbyterians ſhould not by penal laws be forced to a conformity with the church of England: thitherto he had advanced nothing which might make them hope for a public toleration of their creed. The parliament for their part alſo wiſhed for peace, provided by this peace the King was reſtrained from returning to his former courſes, i. e. was ſo humbled that he ſhould not have power to make one ſtep without the conſent of both houſes, and injoy only the empty name of a King, with the external badges of royalty. As to religion, very many, as well members as others, prefered the war's continuation, let what would be the event, to the ſeeing prelates reſtored to their power. This muſt be always remembered, when either party is introduced mentioning peace. A diſpoſition like the earl of Eſſex's was undoubtedly, the cauſe why ſome were dazzled with the bare ſound of peace, and the limitations inſerted in the propoſitions to be ſent to his Majeſty, when the late plot was in agitation: but it may be affirmed, that the chief authors of this artifice were far from having the nation's welfare in view, and thought only of ſerving the King their patron. I queſtion not, but ſome others were perſuaded into a conſent to the propoſitions, by reaſon of the end propoſed by the Preſbyterian party, and now publicly known, perceiving that the advantages the parliament might gain upon his Majeſty, by a continuation of the war, would only ſerve to ruin the church of England with greater facility.

Charles tries in vain to gain the earl. p. 566, &c. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 338. which renders him ſuſpected to the parliament.

Eſſex's integrity occaſioned his experiencing what uſually befals honeſt men in civil diſſenſions, where the moderate paſs for indifferent, and coldly affected to their party. King Charles, who was informed of this nobleman's moderation, imagined he deſired a peace only becauſe he was diſſatisfied with the parliament, and convinced of the injuſtice of the cauſe he had eſpouſed. In this belief, he unſucceſsfully uſed all means to gain him. Contrariwiſe, the moſt violent of the party grew jealous of this earl, perceiving he was no proper inſtrument for their deſigns. Wherefore they no longer confided in him, or at leaſt, feigned not to truſt him, in order to have, by his removal, another general, more compliant and manageable. They turned their eyes on the earl of Mancheſter, known formerly by the name of lord Kimbolton, and began with advancing him to the command of their forces in the Eaſtern aſſociated counties (whereto Lincolnſhire was lately added) to oppoſe the earl of Newcaſtle; and an ordinance was paſſed for preſſing men to reinforce this army.

The earl of Mancheſter made general of the aſſociated counties. p. 248.

Eſſex diſguſted.

Had the earl of Eſſex ſided with the parliament merely thro' paſſion, humor, or intereſt, the mortifications he met with would have been apt to make him turn to the King, to be revenged on the two houſes: but that was not his character. Tho' he had frequently complained of the diſregard ſhewn him, in leaving his army without recruits and cloaths, and tho' ſeveral lords of Charles's party took this occaſion to indeavor perſuading him to ſhift ſides, he ever remained firm to his principles. How ſtrong ſoever their ſollicitations might be, he never gave the leaſt reaſon to believe him capable of betraying the parliament, who had truſted him with the command of their forces. Both houſes being informed of the inſtances made to their general, aſſured him of their eſteem and acknowledgment for his great ſervices, and promiſed to recruit and cloath his army, before thoſe of ſir William Waller, and the earl of Mancheſter, which was done accordingly. This ſatisfaction was more than ſufficient to make him forget all the occaſions of complaint before given him. A celebrated hiſtorian has been pleaſed to aſcribe the earl of Eſſex's conſtant attachment to the parliament, to his not having ſteadineſs enough to ingage in an enterpriſe ſo hazardous as that of forcing the parliament to peace. I am perſuaded, this was owing to King Charles's, and his whole party's prepoſſeſſion, that there was not a ſingle man for the parliament, who was ſatisfied of the juſtice of his cauſe: nor did they ever forgo this prejudice.

Project of Charles's partizans.

The project of thoſe who had undertaken to gain the earl of Eſſex was, that, ſo ſoon as he ſhould give the word, ſuch peers, lords and commoners as were in the ſecret, ſhould retire to the army, and under its protection proteſt againſt the offered violence, the breach of their privileges by the common-council's taking notice of their debates, and over-ruling their concluſions, by hindering the propoſitions being ſent to his Majeſty. They doubted not but, by their example, great numbers would take the ſame courſe, by which means they hoped to be ſtrong enough to conſtrain the parliament to make peace: and, in caſe the houſes ſhould remain obſtinate, their deſign was to enter on a ſeparate treaty with the King, as men undeceived who, having been ſeduced by the parliament, were at length ſenſible of the injuſtice of their cauſe. They fancied all England would do the like, and both houſes be utterly abandoned: for Charles and his party conſtantly imagined that, among all the parliament's adherents, not one was ſo thro' perſuaſion, honor and conſcience, but thro' ſeduction, fear and ignorance. This cauſed them to take ſo many wrong ſteps, to compel the parliament to a peace by the peoples means; ſteps which to that Prince proved extremely prejudicial. That with regard to the earl of Eſſex, was no leſs ſo than the reſt. Thoſe lords and commoners concerned in this ſtratagem, as well as in Waller's conſpiracy, being apprehenſive that Eſſex would betray them, thought proper to avoid being called to account, by withdrawing to his Majeſty. Of this number were the earl of Portland, and lord Conway (who had been impriſoned for Waller's affair, and afterwards releaſed) lord Lovelace (who had only ſtayed with the parliament by Charles's leave) the earls of Clare, Bedford * and Holland. The earl of Northumberland, diſſatisfied with his not having in parliament the ſame credit as formerly, feigning want of health, obtained the houſe's permiſſion for retiring to his ſeat at Petworth, in Suſſex. It was generally believed he had aſſurances from court of not being there moleſted. The retreat of all theſe peers turned greatly to Charles's diſadvantage, as it deprived him of ſo many friends in parliament, who were all ready to ſerve him, and commonly directed his London favorers. Moreover, by the abſenſe of theſe nobles, his Majeſty's adverſaries were more at their eaſe, and found fewer obſtacles to their deſigns than before: for Eſſex's army was ſoon after inabled to relieve Gloceſter, and the parliament approved of the covenant made with Scotland, wherein they would undoubtedly have been oppoſed by thoſe who were lately withdrawn. I muſt now proceed to other matters.

* Not Dorſet as in the French.

Having juſt hinted above, that ſir John Hotham, governor of Hull, was apprehended by order of parliament, it is now time we examine the occaſion of his diſgrace. The King had been ſo inſenſed againſt him, that there was little probability of his ever pardoning the indignity he had received, or of Hotham's delivering himſelf into his hands. Nevertheleſs, a deſire of poſſeſſing Hull in one, and thirſt of revenge in the other, made them forget all had paſſed. Hotham, as he could not bear that (after the ſervice he had done the parliament in keeping Hull for them, without any ſcruple at ſo expoſing himſelf to his Sovereign's indignation) lord Fairfax ſhould be appointed commander in chief of all the Northern forces, a poſt of honor whereof he doubtleſs thought himſelf more worthy, determined on taking vengeance for this pretended injuſtice, by delivering the place to his Majeſty (1). The preciſe time of his applying to the earl of Newcaſtle is not known; but it is certain he wrote to him ſeveral letters, which were communicated to her Majeſty while ſhe was in the North. He had drawn into the conſpiracy his ſon, captain Hotham, and it was between them agreed to deliver Hull to the Queen, when on her march with the troops ſhe had with her. Mean while young Hotham, having given ſome occaſion to ſuſpect him, was ſeized by ſir John Meldrum, and ſent priſoner to Notinghamcastle. He however found means to escape, and going to Lincoln, wrote thence to the parliament, complaining of the injury done him, and affirming, he was ready to answer whatever should be laid to his charge: but as the Queen was now on her march, and it was time to execute the design, he returned to Hull, to concert measures with his father. That Princess judged herself so secure of having Hull in her power very speedily, that she said in her letter to the King, dated June twenty-seven, "She stayed at Newark but for one thing, "to have Hull and Lincoln, for which she hoped "he would pardon two days stop." At the same time orders were sent to seize young Hotham, the mayor of Hull was injoined to have his eye on the father, examine his conduct, and take care to preserve the town. The son's return to Hull after his escape from Notingham, the suspicions he already lay under, and the notice received from the captain of a ship of war then in the road, that Hull, that night or the next, would be delivered to the King, made the mayor (tho' governor Hotham's brother-in-law) resolve to prevent it. That very night, while the Hothams were in bed, all the townsmen, officers and soldiers, of known affection to the parliament, were assembled without noise, and all the ports of the town seized, without sheding one drop of blood, or even discharging a musket. Mean while, I know not for what reason, they had neglected to secure the two Hothams (1), who found means to get out of the town: but, at their coming to Beverley, they were both seized and conducted to London, where, after a long imprisonment, they were condemned and executed.

p. 744, 750.

Two particulars did King Charles great prejudice with the people, and from which he let slip no opportunity to justify himself, conscious how nearly such prepossessions might affect his interest. The first was, that he countenanced Popery: the second, that he had excited the Irish rebellion, or at least connived at it. These two articles both houses made no scruple to insinuate, and even to maintain openly in their papers: not that they had positive proof of what they advanced; but, from his actions and sundry passed occurrences, they drew inferences, to some of which it must be owned he answered but weakly or in generals, or, according to his custom, by ambiguous expressions capable of a double meaning.

As to the first charge, he took occasion to make the following protestation, as he was on the very point of receiving the eucharist from the hands of archbishop Usher.

His Majesty's protestation concerning religion. July. p. 346.

My lord,

"I Espy many resolved Protestants, who may "declare to the world the resolution I do now "make. I have, to the utmost of my power, "prepared my soul to become a worthy receiver; "and may I so receive comfort by the blessed sa-"crament, as I do intend the establishment of the "true reformed Protestant religion, as it stood in "its beauty, in the happy days of Queen Eliza-"beth, without any connivance at Popery. I "bless God that, in the midst of these public dis-"tractions, I have still liberty to communicate; "and may this sacrament be my damnation, if "my heart do not join with my lips in this pro-"testation."

Remark thereon.

King Charles was undoubtely very zealous for the Protestant religion, as professed in the church of England; but it is no less certain, he never scrupled favoring Papists, whether thro' complaisance to his Queen, or from a belief, that a rigid observance of the penal laws made against them was not necessary to the welfare of the Protestant religion. It is therefore very difficult to explain what he could mean by these words, 'without any connivance at Popery.' It cannot be thought, that his intention was to swear, he would never grant the Papists any toleration, since at this very juncture he was negociating the Irish truce, whereby toleration was granted to the Catholics of Ireland; and it will hereafter appear that, in treating of a peace with those rebels, he scrupled not granting them that article. Much less still may we venture to affirm that, by the word 'Connivance,' he understood all manner of condescension for Papists. This sense would be repugnant to his principles and usual practise. It seems therefore most reasonable to think, that he made a distinction between Popery and Papists, and that when he promised to establish religion in its beauty, his meaning was, that he would suffer no Popish tenets to be mixed with the church of England's doctrines. But if such was his meaning, it was not to the purpose, since this was not properly that wherewith he was charged. As he was extremely artful in chusing expressions to which it was difficult to give a fixed and determinate sense, it is certain his most solemn protestations produced not the intended effect.

CHARLES I AN' 1643.

As to the second charge, relating to the Irish rebellion, I do not think I can give a clearer prospect of that affair, than by inserting the substance of a declaration published, on this occasion, by both houses, the twenty-fifth of July, 1643. They shewed:

Declaration of both houses against King Charles, touching the Irish rebellion. Ibid.

"That, in the second year of his Majesty's reign, "a design was formed in Ireland, to bring in a "public toleration of the Popish religion in that "kingdom, and to suspend all proceedings against "Papists, for a sum of money to be paid his Ma-"jesty. That the then bishops of Ireland made "a protestation against it, seting forth, how "grievous a sin it was to consent to such a tolera-"tion, and of what dangerous consequence it "might be. And the house of commons, in a re-"monstrance made in the third year of his Ma-"jesty's reign, informed that, even then, the Po-"pish religion was professed in every part of that "kingdom, and that monasteries and nunneries "were then newly erected, and repleniished with "men and women of several orders, beseeching "his Majesty, that some speedy course might be "taken for redress therein; yet, in the begining "of the fourth year of his Majesty's reign, all "this was granted and confirmed by his Maje-"sty, in consideration of one hundred and twenty "thousand pounds, to be levied in three years upon "the kingdom in general, as well upon the Prote-"stants as upon the Papists.

"That many potent and notorious Papists had "been created peers by his Majesty.

"That when, by direction of the lord chancellor "Loftus, and the earl of Cork, then lords-justices, "proceedings were begun against the Papists, upon "the statute of 2 Elizabeth, for not coming to "church, and the judges in their circuits gave that "statute in charge, and indictments were framed "thereupon; directions were sent from England, "to suspend and stay all proceedings upon that "statute: when, by taking the penalty imposed "by that statute, being nine-pence, for absenting "from church Sundays and holy-days, the poor "Protestants there might have been eased of many "heavy payments and taxes, which were after im-"posed upon them.

" That the rebels in all parts of Ireland pro-" feſſed, that the cauſe of their riſing was, to " preſerve his Majeſty, and the Queen, from being " oppreſſed by the Puritan parliament; and that " it was by their conſent, for they had good " warrant in black and white for what they did. " They called the Engliſh army, parliament-" rogues, and traitors to the Queen; and told " them at the begining of the rebellion, that ere " long they ſhould ſee England as much in blood " as Ireland then was: that they had their party " in England and Scotland, which ſhould keep " both kingdoms ſo buſy at home, that they " ſhould not ſend any aid againſt them; with a " multitude of ſuch like expreſſions from the Iriſh of " the beſt quality; as may appear by the exami-" nations of colonel Audley Mervin, William " Stuart, eſq; Henry Stuart, gent. herewith " printed, and by diverſe other proofs.

" In the ſame month of October, wherein the " rebellion of Ireland brake forth, lord Dillon, " of Coſtelough (now in arms againſt the parlia-" ment and kingdom of England) went out of " Scotland from his Majeſty into Ireland, bring-" ing his Majeſty's letters, obtained by mediation " of the Queen, to be preſently ſworn a privy-" counſellor of Ireland; who, when he had taken " the oath of a privy-counſellor, preſented to the " lords-juſtices and council, from many of the in-" habitants of the county of Longford, a letter " in the nature of a remonſtrance, full of unreaſon-" able demands: as namely, to have freedom of " religion; a repeal of all laws made to the con-" trary, and the like.

" In December, after the rebellion, the ſame " lord Dillon, together with his brother-in-law, " the now lord Taaffe, a notorious Papiſt, re-" paired into England, bringing with them ſeveral " papers and inſtructions from many lords and gen-" tlemen of the Pale, all now in rebellion, to nego-" ciate for them to his Majeſty; and as they ſol-" licit with his Majeſty here on the behalf of the " rebels, ſo do they ſollicit the rebels from hence " in the name of his Majeſty, to perſiſt in their " rebellion; as appears by the teſtimony of mr. " Jephſon, a member of the houſe of commons, " lately delivered at a conference before both " houſes, in theſe words, viz.

" At my late being at Oxford, finding my lord " Dillon and lord Taaffe in favor at court, I " acquainted lord Falkland, his Majeſty's ſecretary, " that there were two lords about the King, who,

Charles I An' 1643.

" to his Majeſty's great diſhonor, and the " great diſcouragement of his good ſubjects, did " make uſe of his Majeſty's name to incourage " the rebels. To make this appear, I informed, " that I had ſeen two letters ſent by lord Dillon " and lord Taaffe to lord Muſkerie, the chief man " in rebellion in Munſter, and one of the Iriſh " commitee ſent into England, intimating; that, " tho' it did not ſtand with the conveniency of his " Majeſty's affairs to give him public countenance, " yet his Majeſty was well pleaſed with what " he did, and would in time give him thanks for " it; or near to that purpoſe. That theſe letters " were ſeen by lord Inchiquin, the chief commander " of the Engliſh forces in Munſter, and by his ſe- " cretary, who had kept copies of them; and " that I was ready to juſtify as much. Where- " upon lord Falkland was pleaſed to ſay, that " they deſerved to be hanged: but tho' I ſtayed " at Oxford about a week after this diſcovery made, " I never was called to any farther account, nor any " prejudice done to theſe two lords, but they had " the ſame freedom in court as before, for ought " I could obſerve or hear to the contrary.

" That, ſince this diſcovery made to lord Falk- " land, the ſame lord Taaffe, one Roche, and " William Brent a lawyer, active Papiſts, went " with letters from his Majeſty, from Oxford to " Dublin. And upon Thurſday before Whitſun- " tide, 1643, in the evening, taking with them " one colonel Barry, a profeſſed Papiſt, and pre- " tending for Connaught, did ſlip away to Kilken- " ny, where the Tueſday following was a general " aſſembly of all the chief rebels. When they had " done their errand, Barry was left lieger at Kil- " kenny among the rebels; lord Taaffe returned to " Dublin, and, upon Friday the ninth of June, " 1643, lord Taaffe, with diverſe of the privy- " council of Ireland, who favored the rebels, met " at the marquis of Ormond's houſe, where the " propoſitions which lord Taaffe brought from the " rebels were debated. Lord Taaffe is ſince gone " into Connaught; Brent is come back to Oxford, " to give account of this imployment.

" By this every man may conſtrue, what was " meaned by his Majeſty's not conſenting that the " parliament ſhould ſend a commitee into Ireland " laſt year, to indeavor carrying on the war againſt " the rebels, upon pretenſe that the earl of Leiceſter " was preſently to go over thither, who is yet " remaining at Oxford. That when this com- " mitee had prevailed with the lords-juſtices " and council, and with many of the prime " commanders and other officers of the army " in Leinſter, to ſubſcribe, by way of adven- " ture, very conſiderable ſums, for land in Ireland " to be ſetled by a new bill, which were to be " deducted out of their reſpective entertainments; " then, to render this indeavor fruitleſs, one captain " Yarner did confidently affirm, that thoſe who " had, or ſhould ſubſcribe, were enemies to the " King; a thing ſo incredible, that few could be- " lieve it, 'till the ſame man went to Oxford: " and upon his return to Dublin, aſſured the lord " marquis of Ormond and the officers, that he had " diſcourſed with his Majeſty about this way of " ſubſcription, and that his Majeſty did not ap- " prove of the ſame. Whereupon thoſe who had " ſubſcribed did withdraw their hands, and the reſt " were wholly diſcouraged.

" That, about this time, a commiſſion was " ſent over, to meet with the rebels, and to hear " what they could ſay, or propound for themſelves; " which commiſſion was directed to the lord marquis " of Ormond, and to ſome other commiſſioners; " among whom Thomas Bourk, who had a hand " in contriving this rebellion, was one, and who " brought the ſaid commiſſion to Ireland, and con- " fidently delivered the ſame at the council-table, " to the amazement of all the council then preſent, " who were not acquainted with the plot.

Charles I An' 1643.

" That the lords and commons, to whoſe di- " rection the war was commited, thought it expe- " dient to ſend into Ireland a commitee for that " purpoſe, conſiſting of members of the houſe of " commons, but authoriſed from both houſes; who " carried with them above twenty thouſand pounds " in ready money, beſide great ſtore of powder, " match, and other ammunition: but when thoſe " who favored the rebels ſaw that, during the " abode of the commitee there, parties were con- " tinually ſent forth to deſtroy the enemy; and " that the commitee ingaged their own particular " credits to take up monies for the relief and ſeting " forth of the army; a letter was ſent from his " Majeſty, and brought over by the marquis of " Ormond's own ſecretary, wherein his Majeſty " did require the lords-juſtices and council, not " to admit the commitee any more at their debates: " and it is obſervable, that this letter was only " ſigned with his Majeſty's hand, without any " ſecretary's hand to avow the ſame.

" The commons cannot conceive what is " meaned, that the juſtices and council are ſtraitly " charged, in that letter, upon their allegiance, not " to ſuffer the commitee to ſow ſedition among " his Majeſty's good ſubjects; unleſs, to ſtir up " and incite the Engliſh ſoldiers, in the parlia- " ment's pay, to proceed vigorouſly againſt the " Iriſh rebels, be conſtrued as ſowing ſedition " among his Majeſty's good ſubjects.

" That, according to the teſtimony of ſir Wil- " liam Brereton, knight of the ſhire for the county " of Cheſter, there landed, in June 1643, many " Iriſh rebels at Werral, in Cheſhire, ſome whereof " acknowledged, they had waſhed their hands in " the blood of ſeveral Engliſh and Scots in Ireland, " and now hoped to waſh their hands in the blood " of Engliſhmen in England. The country where " theſe rebels firſt arrived did all riſe, with their " beſt weapons, and apprehended ſeveral of them; " but they were reſcued out of their hands by a " troop of horſe, which came from the commiſſio- " ners of array, who alſo ſeized priſoners about " twenty-eight of the honeſt countrymen.

" And that the councils now predominant at " Oxford, and the ſupreme council of rebels at " Kilkenny, are concuring and aiding one another, " as well by ſea as by land, is apparent by that " which follows. The commiſſioners authoriſed " to command the King's forces in the Weſt, by " an authority derived unto them under the great " ſeal of England, do grant commiſſions, or letters " of mart, for the apprehending and taking, for " his Majeſty's ſervice, all ſhips and veſſels be- " longing to the cities and towns which have de- " clared for the parliament; and, on the other " ſide, the rebels of Ireland grant the like com- " miſſions. And as the ſhips in his Majeſty's ſer- " vice do gratify the rebels of Ireland, in ſeizing " ſuch ſhips as bring proviſion for the relief of " the Engliſh army in Ireland; ſo the rebels of " Ireland do, in like manner, gratify his Majeſty, " by commanding the ſhips ſet forth by them " to examine all Engliſh ſhips at ſea, whether " they be for the King or parliament; and if " they be for the King, to let them go; but if " for the parliament, to take and pillage them. " All which is proved by depoſitions herewith " annexed.

" The earl of Antrim, a notorious rebel, was " taken by the Scots army in Ulſter, and impri- " ſoned there upon ſuſpicion of high-treaſon. To " avoid his trial, he brake priſon, and fled into " the North-parts of England, and hath been with " the Queen at York a long time; from whence " he was ſent to the rebels of Ulſter, with ſecret " inſtructions, and had ammunition aſſigned him " by the Queen's directions: and what care was " taken of his ammunition appears by a letter here " annexed, dated at York the eighth of May, " 1643, written by ſerjeant-major Roſſe, at the " deſire of mr. Jermin.

" Since this care taken of the ammunition of the " the earl of Antrim, the earl of Antrim is taken " a ſecond time by major-general Monroe, as he " was returning, from the Queen to the rebels of " Ulſter, with diverſe letters, inſtructions and " papers: and by the confeſſion and depoſition of " the earl of Antrim's own ſervant, who was taken " with his maſter, and ſince condemned and exe- " cuted, it is evident, that there was, and doubtleſs " yet is, a deſign on foot to reconcile the Engliſh " and Iriſh in Ireland; and that, by their joint " power, having expelled the Scots, the Iriſh " forces there might be ſent againſt the parliament " of England. The earl of Antrim, the lord of " Aboyn, and the earl of Niddiſdale, were three " principal agents imployed in this plot. This " clearly appears, in that the lord of Aboyn, in a " letter taken in the earl of Antrim's pocket, " writes in theſe words:

My Lord,

BEing certainly informed, by Niddiſdale's ſervant, that there is a new order, ſince we parted, for ſtoping the ammunition, I have taken occaſion to intreat your lordſhip, by this bearer, that I may know the particulars of it. I muſt confeſs it ſurprifeth me, that any diſtance ſhould alter ſo ſeaſonable a concluſion: and, certainly, I ſhall never deſerve to be made the inſtrument of fruſtrating the hopes of thoſe parts, which ſhould have been inabled by this ſupply: I am perſuaded, there is ſcarce another mean to make our fidelity uſeleſs for her Majeſty's ſervice.

" And that it might appear to the rebels of Ire- " land, that the earl of Antrim was accounted his " Majeſty's good ſubject, and had his Majeſty's " approbation for what he was to act there, he " was furniſhed with a paſs from the earl of New- " caſtle.

(The paſs is here inſerted at length in the declaration. The reſidue of this article tends to ſhew, by the earl of Antrim's confeſſion, and that of Stuart, one of his ſervants, that the earl was imployed by the Queen to make peace with the rebels.)

" The houſe of commons, among a numerous " company of proofs of this kind, concluded with " the teſtimony of John Dod, late miniſter at " Annegilliffe in the county of Cavan, who was " examined at the bar of the houſe of commons, " and teſtifieth,

That, after he had ſuffered many miſeries in this rebellion of Ireland, he repaired into this kingdom, and ſome occaſions carrying him to Oxford, he ſtayed there ſeven weeks, and came out of Oxford the thirteenth of June, 1643. That, during his ſtay there, he ſaw a great number of Iriſh rebels, whom he very well knew to have a hand in the moſt barbarous actions of that rebellion; as daſhing ſmall infants in pieces, riping up women with child, and the like, among whom one Thomas Brady, who (was at Turbet in Ireland, within ſeven miles where the ſaid Dod lived) as thirty-ſix old men, women and children, not able to flee, were paſſing over a bridge, cauſed them to be thrown into the water, where they were all drowned; that this Brady is now at Oxford in great favor, and ſerjeant-major to colonel Percy's regiment: that he ſaw there three Franciſcan friers, namely; —— and three Jeſuits, namely; —— who were all very earneſt for the cauſe, and daily incouraging the ſoldiers to fight againſt the Roundheads, and for that purpoſe have liſted themſelves in lord Dillon's troop, and are called cornets: that there are daily and public meetings at maſs, in almoſt every ſtreet there; and verily believes in his conſcience that, for one ſermon preached, there are four maſſes ſaid now at Oxford: tha the ſaw there ſir John Dungan, a man accuſed of high-treaſon in Ireland, for being in the rebellion, and fled into England, who hath a commiſſion for a troop of horſe; lord Barnewall of Thimbleſtown, and his ſon, who hath a commiſſion for a troop of horſe, and is now gone into Wales to raiſe them; a ſon of lord Newterfield, who hath got a command likewiſe: that, as near as he can poſſibly compute, there were then at Oxford above three thouſand rebels; and that moſt of the King's life-guards are Iriſh.

The two houſes thus concluded: " Upon the " whole matter, no man can think, that this re- " bellion in Ireland, ſo barbarous and bloody, that " one hundred and fifty four thouſand Proteſtants, " men, women and children, Engliſh and Scots, " were maſſacred in that kingdom, between the " twenty-third of October, when the rebellion " brake forth, and the firſt of March following, " by the computation of the prieſts themſelves " who were preſent, and were directed by ſome " chief rebels of Ireland to take this computation, " leſt they ſhould be reported to be more bloody " than in truth there was cauſe: No man can be- " lieve, that this horrid and unparalleled rebellion " ſhould be the undertaking of the rebels alone, " being ſet on foot when in England ſate a par- " liament, which could not diſſolve without its " own conſent, when all nations profeſſing the " Romiſh religion were at peace with England, " and ſo ingaged at home, that the rebels, in rea- " ſon, could not expect any conſiderable aſſiſtance " from them, nor could think themſelves able to " incounter England or Scotland either, much leſs " both together: ſo that to imagine the nobility, " gentry, and, in a manner, the whole kingdom " of Ireland, ſhould thus deſparately ingage their " lives and eſtates in ſo raſh an enterpriſe, without " being incouraged, incited, nay commanded " from England, with aſſurance both of conni- " vance and aſſiſtance too, were to deny them to " be reaſonable creatures.

" And therefore the houſe of commons, abun- " dantly ſatisfied in their own conſciences and " judgments of the truth thereof, cannot but de- " clare to the world, That, by all theſe concur- " ing circumſtances, and convincing proofs, they " are perſuaded, that this unheard-of and monſtrous " rebellion of Ireland was projected, incited, " and aſſiſted by thoſe councils now only preva- " lent with his Majeſty: that the Queen, with her " Romiſh prieſts, the Papiſts of all his Majeſty's " three kingdoms, have been principal actors " and ſticklers therein: that now thoſe bloody " rebels have, in a manner, rooted out the Pro- " teſtant religion in Ireland, there is a deſign to " pardon them, and bring them into England to " do the like: that no earthly power is likely, in " human reaſon, to withſtand this damnable plot, " but the power of the parliament in England, " which is now declared, by a late proclamation, " to be no free parliament, to be null and of none " effect; and all poſſible indeavor uſed, by ſtrength " and ſtratagem, to deſtroy the ſame. So that " the houſe of commons do conceive it impoſſi- " ble,

" ble, that ſo many of thoſe who would be " the honeſt and moderate Engliſh Proteſtants " ſhould be blinded and led on to join with Ger- " man, French, Walloon, Engliſh, Scotiſh, and " Iriſh Papiſts, and thereby to ſurrender up at " once the Proteſtant religion, the parliament, " liberties and laws of England, into the hands " of Papiſts and ſtrangers, that ſo this renowned " kingdom may be no more a nation."

As the charge againſt King Charles of exciting the Iriſh rebellion, or at leaſt of conniving at it, made a great noiſe in thoſe days, and as all hiſtories are full of it, I judged it neceſſary to ſhew the grounds or pretenſes thereof, by giving the ſubſtance of this declaration: for it is not likely, the parliament ſhould have omited any thing capable of proving the aſſertion, tho' it be true that his Majeſty afterwards took certain ſteps which could have greatly helped to ſwell this manifeſto. I ſhould be glad, according to my uſual method, to give here this Prince's particular anſwer to theſe articles: but I have not been able to find any, nor am even certain he ever anſwered it. Indeed he uſed his utmoſt indeavors to clear himſelf from this accuſation; but it was only by generals and proteſtations, without replying to any particular article, no not even in his Eikon Baſiliké, whoſe writer undertakes to vindicate his whole conduct.

I cannot therefore but obſerve, concerning this declaration, that ſome of its articles ſeem highly exagerated; and from others may be drawn conſequences not ſo very atrocious as thoſe here inſinuated. But withal it cannot be denied, but it contains ſome, to which it were to be wiſhed, for King Charles's honor, he had returned diſtinct and particular anſwers.

Policy of the parliament in accuſing King Charles.

It appears by this manifeſto, that the parliament very little regarded his Majeſty: but, over and above the pique and animoſity which might enter into the deſign of blackening his reputation, it is certain, policy had no ſmall ſhare therein. Charles, in all his public papers, repreſented himſelf as abſolutely innocent of all laid to his charge, and as having undertaken the war purely in defenſe of the nation's laws and liberties. He deſcribed the two houſes as a crew of robbers, who, for their own private ends, had put the kingdom in a blaze, refuſed the obedience due to him, and, without any cauſe trampled upon all the known laws of the land. Nor was gratifying the paſſion of revenge this Prince's ſole motive: there was another much more dangerous to the parliament; and that was, to draw the people of London to his ſide, by means of theſe papers (which his friends took care to diſperſe in the city) and thereby to force both houſes to conclude ſuch a peace as he deſired, i. e. a peace which ſhould render to him his prerogatives intire. If therefore the two houſes, thro' deference to their Sovereign, had neglected defending themſelves, their ſilence might have been extremely detrimental to them, ſince people are apt to believe, if accuſations are not replied to, it is becauſe no pertinent anſwer can be given. It was therefore the parliament's buſineſs to try, as far as poſſible, to inlighten the people, on whom the King, as they pretended, ſtrove to impoſe by general proteſtations, wherewith they labored to demonſtrate his actions did not correſpond. This was the grand view of their declaration, wherein they indeavored to manifeſt Charles's inſincerity, in that, while he called heaven and earth to witneſs, that he had no other intention than to maintain the Proteſtant religion, " without conniving at Popery," he was ſtriving to make peace with the Iriſh rebels; a peace which, in the then juncture of affairs, could not be concluded but by conceſſions wholly inconſiſtent with the Proteſtant religion's ſafety.

On the other hand, as King Charles, by his papers and emiſſaries in London, was perpetually laboring to convince the public of the greatneſs and ſincerity of his zeal for religion, for the laws and liberties of his good ſubjects, without ever mentioning what paſſed the firſt fifteen years of his reign, the two houſes were intereſted to renew the remembrance of thoſe times, leſt the occaſion of their fears and jealouſies ſhould finally be obliterated: wherefore they took two ſteps very proper to produce this effect. The firſt was, to order King James's book for tolerating ſports on Sundays, which Charles had cauſed to be re-publiſhed in the churches, to be burned by the common executioner. This book, being in a manner out of memory, could not produce any great effects at the time we are now upon; but, in all appearance, the meaning of both houſes was thereby to inſinuate to the people, what was to be expected from their Sovereign's exceſs of zeal for religion, in caſe he came to be reſtored to his priſtine authority. The ſecond was, to proceed to judgment againſt judge Berkley, whom the peers had condemned in the exorbitant fine of twenty thouſand pounds, and to ſtand commited to the Tower, 'till he ſhould be tried upon the other articles alleged againſt him: for this ſentence concerned only that part of his charge relating to his extrajudicial deciſions in the caſe of ſhip-money. Berkley was one of Charles's moſt zealous inſtruments to eſtabliſh arbitrary power; nevertheleſs, he had now lain three years in priſon, without being thought of: but, this year, the parliament believed it proper to bring him to judgment, as well to revive the memory of a time which his Majeſty was indeavoring to bury in oblivion, as to reap the benefit of his fine (1). The latter motive makes lord Clarendon ſay, that the parliament, in appropriating to themſelves the ſaid fine, which by law was due to the King alone, were thought, by many, to be guilty of a greater crime than that for which Berkley was ſentenced. This ſuppoſes that, even when the King and parliament were making war upon each other, the parliament ſhould do the King juſtice, and ſend him the money ariſing from fines and confiſcations. But the two houſes were ſo far from allowing this maxim, that contrariwiſe they, that very month, paſſed an ordinance for ſeizing the King's, Queen's, and Prince's revenues, for public uſe (2), i. e. to be imployed in this war againſt the King. Four days after, King Charles on his part iſſued out a proclamation, forbiding all tenants or debtors to pay any rents, or debts to ſuch perſons as were in open rebellion againſt him. But theſe orders, as well from King as parliament, were executed only in places where they were ſupported with power.

Moſt of the lords, who had withdrawn from the parliament, and retired to his Majeſty, meeting with a very cold reception at Oxford, thought fit once more to change ſides, and return to London. The earl of Holland led the way. He was at firſt put under confinement; but, ſome days after, had leave to live upon his own eſtate, without any imploy. Seemingly, he had expected a better reception; ſince, after his return, he publiſhed a declaration very injurious to the King, wherein he said that, retiring to Oxford, in hopes by his credit to procure a peace, he had been laboring it to the utmost of his power, but (added he) without success, the King and his council being intirely averse to all accommodation, because every thing at court was managed by the Papists (1). The earl of Northumberland, who was retired to Petworth, being informed how ill the earl of Holland was received at Oxford, judged proper to return to the parliament, where he was received with respect; both houses being willing to suppose, he never intended to quit them, tho' many suspected he had withdrawn to his own estate, purposely to see what reception the other lords would find at Oxford. The earls of Bedford and Clare took also the same course, and came off with being for a time excluded their seats in parliament (2).

Bedford and Clare.

The parliament orders a new great-seal. p. 312. Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 339. T. May.

One of the chief occurrences of this year, 1643, was the resolution of both houses to make a new great-seal. It had been proposed by the commons in July; but, whether thro' scruple, as some pretended, or because King Charles's secret party were yet very numerous in the house of peers, the lords refused consenting, or rather delayed their answer: but, in the insuing November, their scruples vanished. The commons, in a conference, represented to them the mischiefs occasioned by the conveying away, and thro' the want of the great-seal (3).

I. It was secretly and unlawfully carried away by the lord-keeper Littleton, who ought not to have departed without leave of both houses: nor would have been suffered to do so, if his intentions had been discovered.

II. It hath been since taken away from him, and put into the hands of ill-affected persons, so as the lord-keeper, being sent to by the parliament for the sealing some writs, answered, "He could not seal "the same, because he had not the seal in his "keeping."

III. That those who have had the managing thereof, have imployed it to the hurt and destruction of the kingdom; as by making new sheriffs, to be as so many commanders of forces against the parliament; by issuing out illegal commissions of array; by sending forth proclamations against both houses of parliament, proclaiming them traitors.

And, thro' want of the great-seal, 1. The terms have been adjourned; the course of justice obstructed. 2. No original writs can be sued for without going to Oxford, which none who hold with the parliament can do, without peril of life or liberty. 3. Proclamations in parliament cannot issue out for bringing in delinquents impeached of high-treason, or other crimes, under pain of forfeiting their estates. 4. No writs of error can be brought in parliament to reverse erroneous judgments, nor writs of election issued out for chusing new members upon death or removal of any, whereby the number of members is continually lessening. 5. Every other court of justice has a peculiar seal, and the parliament, the supreme court, has no other seal but the great-seal, and so now no seal at all. 6. The great-seal is the 'Clavis Regni,' and therefore ought to be resident with the parliament (the representative of the whole kingdom) while it continues siting; the King, as well as the kingdom being always legally present in it during its session.

Next day, the lords declared their consent to the making a new great-seal. Accordingly a great-seal was made exactly like that in the King's hands (4), and, by an ordinance of both houses, it was declared, that all letters patents, and grants which had passed under the great-seal, since the twenty-second of May 1642 (5), were void and of no effect: that the new great-seal should be of like force, power and validity as any great-seal of England had ever been, and be put into the custody of the persons hereby ordained commissioners for that purpose, who should have the same power and authority as any lord-chancellor, or lord-keeper, used to have. On the last of November, the new great-seal was carried up, by the speaker of the commons, attended with the whole house, to their lordships, and delivered to lord Grey of Werk, their speaker, who in presense of both houses gave it to the commissioners. The first thing sealed with it, was a patent to the earl of Warwick, of lord high-admiral of England, the earl of Northumberland not being in that favor with both houses as formerly.

Remark on this new great-seal. p. 312.

Charles and his partisans made great noise upon this incroachment of the parliament, and urged the statute of the 25 Edward III, whereby counterfeiting the great-seal is expresly declared to be high-treason. But it is easy to perceive, this statute concerns only private persons, and not both houses of parliament, and that it was not possible, when the said statute was made, to foresee the King and the parliament would be one day divided. Beside, it cannot be said, that private persons have any right to dispose of the great-seal. But it is not the same with both houses of parliament, who are the nation's representatives: for the great-seal is not the King's seal in particular, but the kingdom's, and the kingdom is a body composed of the Sovereign, who is the head, and the people who are the members. If the King has the great-seal at his disposal, it is only as he is the most noble of this body's members, considered as being united with, and not as being separated from the other members (6). If therefore such a separation, as was at the time I am speaking of, happens, it is hard to conceive, by what title the King or people, separately, may claim disposal of the great-seal, which is the seal of their joint, not separate authority. In a word, I scarcely suppose them who most strenously affirm that, in such a separation, the King ought to have the sole disposal of the great-seal, to be willing to admit all the consequences flowing from that principle. The great-seal stamps a not violable authority on all acts whereto it is affixed. If therefore, in case of open war between King and parliament, the King could, by means of the great-seal, communicate such authority to all his particular acts, where would be the bounds of his power, which by the government's constitution is limited by laws? He would need only to declare, by proclamation under the great-seal, as King Charles had actually done, that, according to law, the members of parliament are traitors and rebels, and then the point would be decided by the sole possession of the great-seal, and the Sovereign might, by this authority, assume a power unlimited. But how would the case be, if the parliament was in possession of the great-seal, and by a like proclamation should declare the King traitor and rebel; would the application of the seal give to such an act a not violable authority?

(1) Lord Clarendon (Vol. II. p. 283.) observes, upon this occasion, that the ill reception of these lords made the King, and all about him, looked upon as implacable; and so diverted all men from any thoughts of returning to their duty, and chuse rather to stay where they were, than expose themselves by unseasonable and unwelcome addresses.

(2) It was said in drollery, that these three earls had much confirmed others to continue with the parliament; for they, having tried both parties, found it by experience, that this was the best to be in, and adhere to. Whitelock, p. 71.

(3) Our author having confounded these two reasons for making a new great-seal, we have rectified his mistakes.

It will undoubtedly be urged, that the great-seal gives inviolable authority to such acts only as are agreeable to the laws, and that the laws expresly declare guilty of high-treason such as take arms against the Sovereign. But it is manifest, the laws, as they neither could, nor ought to foresee such actual separation between King and people represented in parliament, have considered the King only as head inseparably united with the body, and not as the head divided from the other members. Else it might be said, the laws have ascribed to the King unlimited power, which is directly contrary to the English government's constitution. Most certainly, the laws have considered the King but as head of the state, and the crime of taking arms against him relates not more to his person in particular, than to the rest of the state. This parliament therefore seems to have had no less right to make a new great-seal, than King Charles would have had if the common-seal had been in the parliament's hands; since the seal was not either's property, but appertained to both, considered as inseparably united.

Count Harcourt's embassy. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 306. Whitelock.

About this time, count Harcourt, a Prince of the Lorrain family, was sent over to England from France. He came directly to London, where he was received with great ceremony, as embassador extraordinary, tho' he had not presented to the parliament his credentials: but it was supposed he was not without them, and designed first to address his Majesty. After a few days stay in London, without any application to both houses, he set out for Oxford, where he had diverse conferences with the King. He then wrote to the earl of Northumberland, that having, from the King and Queen-regent of France, proposed to his Britannic Majesty the making a peace with his subjects, he found him wholly inclined to enter into negociation; and that, if both houses would inform him wherein consisted the differences between the King and them, he would gladly use his interest to adjust them. Both houses thought it very strange, that this Prince should offer his mediation, without producing his credentials. They therefore, by the earl of Northumberland, let him know, that they received, with all due respect, the offers of the King and Queen-regent of France, and that as soon as he should shew he was authorised for such a mediation, they would not fail to appoint a commitee to treat with him. But he had no credentials for the two houses, the Queen-regent not judging proper to own them for a parliament, since the King of England refused them that title. So, this pretended mediation was not only fruitless, but was a clear indication, that the French court had sent this embassy to testify externally their interesting themselves in King Charles's affairs, tho' they, very apparently, did not much desire to see England's combustions terminated (1).

Sir Edward Deering returns to the parliament: Feb. 2. Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 383. Ludlow.

Sir Edward Deering, who at the begining of this parliament had made himself so famous by a fervent zeal for his country, and by sundry memorable speeches upon grievances, was become excessively averse to the proceedings of both houses, since he found the aim of some leading-men was to establish Presbytery in the church of England. For that cause, after the war commenced, he abandoned the parliament, and turned to the King. But, in all appearance, he was no better pleased with the court than he had been with the parliament, since he at length followed the example of those lords above-mentioned. He came to London in February, 1643-4, and presenting a petition to the house of commons, whereof he was a member, he obtained leave to pass the residue of his days at his country seat, where within few months he died.

Pym's death. Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 376. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 353.

Mr. Pym, one of the parliament's pillars, and a principal director of the house's affairs, died December the eighth, 1643. King Charles's favorers speak of him as of a very wicked man; while the parliamentarians represent him as the greatest patriot then in England. Opinions so opposite about the same person are not uncommon. It is not strange that from contrary principles should be drawn contrary consequences. Thus much is certain, mr. Pym's death was a very great loss to the parliament, he being one of the commoners ablest members.

The parliament hangs one of the King's messengers as a spy. Novem. 27. Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 369.

The lower-house, as has been hinted, did in May this year, 1643, imprison one whom Charles had sent with offers of peace, and shortly after, he was discovered to be one of those imployed by his Majesty to keep a correspondence in London. That Prince could not be ignorant of the commons having twice declared, they would treat as spies such as should come from his quarters to London, without a safe-conduct. Beside having good correspondents in London and the parliament, he had no occasion to be informed of these particular resolutions to know, it is not allowable for any without a pass to enter their enemies quarters, since it is a maxim received whereseever war is declared. But there was in the present case something still more particular: for, upon the arresting this messenger by the house, his Majesty, by advice of his council, had deemed it inconsistent with his honor to hold any farther correspondence with the parliament. Morever, the eighteenth of October, both p. 367. houses had published an ordinance, declaring that any person coming to London, from the King's quarters, should be looked on as a spy. Nevertheless, twelve days after, on the thirtieth of October, Charles sent privately to London Daniel Kniveton, a state-messenger, with three proclamations; one against 'taking the solemn league and co-"venant;' another, against 'observing the month-"ly fast,' injoined by the parliament; a third for "removing to Oxford the seals of the green-wax "offices belonging to the Exchequer, King's-"bench, and Common-pleas.' This man was apprehended and sent to prison. Notwithstanding, the nineteenth of November following, Carpenter, another messenger, was privately sent by the King with his order, that the judges should adjourn the term to Oxford. Carpenter was likewise seized, and they were both tried and condemned to die. Kniveton was the less excusable, as he had before been taken and detained at Windsor for the same reason, and discharged by the general. All the defense he made was, that, being the King's sworn messenger, he was obliged to obey him; that beside, not taking London for a garison, he thought he might have come without drum, trumpet or pass. But this defense not sufficing, he was executed. Carpenter, tho' under the same condem- p. 370 Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 314. nation, was reprieved and commited to Bridewell. Lord Clarendon speaks of the sentence passed upon these men as of a great injustice, for two reasons; that they were obliged to obey the King, being his messengers, and that the parliament had not caused

(1) While count Harcourt was in England, he had two affronts put upon him. 1. He had not been landed twenty-four hours, before Walter Montague, one of his train, was apprehended and commited to the Tower. This man was an agent of the King's in the court of France, and thought, by disguising himself, to get a safe passage to Oxford, in the embassador's retinue. 2. As count Harcourt was going from London to Oxford, his coach was searched for letters, tho' he had a safe-conduct. For both which indignities, he could get no redress. their ordinance to be notified to his Majeſty. I doubt, whether all readers will be induced by theſe reaſons to condemn the proceedings of both houſes. The King at leaſt ſeems not to have blamed them, ſince he did not uſe repriſals, neither does it appear that he ever complained of it formally.

In proportion as hoſtilities advanced, the animoſity grew ſtronger between King and parliament, who no longer regarded each other. Charles refuſed to own the two houſes for a parliament, and they, as appears in their declaration concerning the Iriſh rebellion, omited nothing might ſully that Prince's reputation. Theſe proceedings were not confined only to England, where they might be in ſome meaſure neceſſary, becauſe the point was to gain the people; but care was alſo taken to convey beyond-ſea papers, tending to juſtify one of the parties, and blacken the other. Both houſes, being informed, or poſſibly ſurmiſing it only, that the King had abroad emiſſaries, who were uſing their utmoſt indeavors to repreſent the civil wars in England as a horrible rebellion againſt the Sovereign, ordered the aſſembly of divines, then ſitting at Weſtminſter, to write letters to the churches of Zealand, Holland, France, and Swiſſerland, to warn them againſt the artifices of King Charles's agents, by giving them a clear relation of the affairs of England. They charged them to inſiſt chiefly on the King's appointing Iriſh rebels, and other Papiſts, to be governors, commanders and ſoldiers; to lay before them the proofs of the intention of his ſaid Majeſty's counſellors to introduce Popery, and obſtruct ſuch reformation as was deſigned by the parliament: laſtly, to inform them of the diſadvantageous opinion of the King's party concerning the Proteſtant churches abroad, becauſe not governed by biſhops. The aſſembly failed not ſending to theſe churches a circular letter, which was properly a manifeſto for the parliament againſt King Charles, with copies of the ſolemn league and covenant, and of the declaration of England and Scotland on that ſubject.

The aſſembly of divines write to the churches abroad by order of parliament. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 371.

Some time after, the King on his part publiſhed a manifeſto, addreſſed to all the Proteſtant churches, to efface the impreſſions which the parliament's circular letter might have cauſed. This manifeſto, which was very brief, contained only a proteſtation, that he had never intended to conſent to the public exerciſe of Popery in his dominions, but was firmly reſolved to adhere with his lateſt breath to the church of England, wherein he was born, baptized and educated; and to the liturgy of that church, approved by ſo many convocations and parliaments, by all the Proteſtant churches, and the ſynod of Dort.

King Charles's manifeſto touching religion. May 14. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 752.

During this, his Majeſty was ſtrangely perplexed how to carry on the inſuing campain, knowing the parliament were preparing to exert themſelves powerfully. He had been openly charged, before this parliament, with arbitrarily exacting money of his ſubjects, without conſent of parliament. He likewiſe more than once owned, he had exceeded his power, ſince he had not only redreſſed that grievance, but proteſted, he had redreſſed it freely and willingly. Since the war commenced, he had never ceaſed accuſing both houſes of theſe very actions, which he himſelf had been ſo often upbraided with, in that they impoſed taxes upon the ſubjects without their conſent, which was directly contrary to the known laws, whereon he conſtantly inſiſted. By demonſtrating that both houſes violated the laws, he pretended to gain the people to his intereſt. Mean while, money was neceſſarily to be raiſed, not only to maintain the forces already on foot, but alſo to levy others, in order to reſiſt the Scots, who were on the point of entering England. If, for the maintenance of theſe forces, he had impoſed taxes by his ſole authority, he could not have reproached both houſes for a like procedure, and poſſibly would have diſobliged his own party by acting contrary to law. Money however was to be found at any rate, otherwiſe he would not be able to continue the war, Hitherto he had uſed ſundry methods to ſupply his wants, without giving any advantage againſt him, whether by ſelling or mortgaging the crown-lands, or by the voluntary contributions of his well-wiſhers: but the means he had already uſed were too uncertain to be ſafely relied on. He ſought therefore and found an expedient to free himſelf from this dilemma. He aſſembled at Oxford all the members who, according to him, had been driven from the parliament; pretending, theſe members were the true parliament, and the more as he had publicly declared, he no longer regarded as ſuch the two houſes at Weſtminſter. He expected not this new parliament would augment the number of his friends; but he could reaſonably hope it would grant him a ſupply of money, and that, being authoriſed by ſuch an act, he might openly, and by way of authority levy what money was neceſſary. This happened accordingly, and was properly Charles's aim in calling this parliament, which met at Oxford the twenty-ſecond of January, 1643-4.

Parliament at Oxford. p. 560.

As it was not proper his Majeſty ſhould immediately diſcover his ſole end in calling this extraordinary parliament, he only told them in his firſt ſpeech, that he had aſſembled them to receive their advice, and conſult with them how to appeaſe the kingdom's troubles.

The firſt ſtep taken by this parliament was, indeavouring to convince the public of their intention to labor for peace. I have already explained the conſtant ambiguity of the word peace, and the different ſenſes given it by the two parties, and therefore think a repetition wholly needleſs. Indiſputably, Charles heartily wiſhed for a peace: but it was on condition it ſhould be made after his manner, and in his ſenſe of the word; elſe he was very averſe to it. To be convinced of what I advance, one needs only reflect on what lord Clarendon ſays, ſpeaking of the motion made in council to ſummon the Oxford parliament, which his Majeſty ſomewhat ſcrupled. "The King was at firſt in ſome "apprehenſion (ſays that illuſtrious hiſtorian) "that ſuch a conflux of perſons together of the "parliament, who would look to injoy the privi"leges of it in their debates, might, inſtead of "doing him ſervice, do many things contrary to "it, and exceedingly apprehended, that they would "immediately enter upon ſome treaty of peace, "which would have no effect, yet, while it was "in ſuſpenſe, would hinder his preparation for "war; and tho' no body more deſired peace, yet "he had no mind that a multitude ſhould be con"ſulted upon the conditions of it: imagining, that "things of the greateſt importance, as the giving "up perſons, and other particulars of honor, "would not ſeem to them of moment enough to "continue a war in the kingdom." Hence appears what ſort of peace was deſired by the King. It was not ſuch a peace as the Oxford parliament might think reaſonable, but a peace whereby he ſhould not be obliged to make any conceſſions.

But his council quickly freed him from theſe apprehenſions, by the ſame method uſed on a like occaſion, in the begining of this war. It was intimated to him, that there was no probability, the two houſes at Weſtminſter would ever treat with the members who ſhould meet at Oxford, becauſe they would not regard them any otherwiſe than as private perſons, and deſerters of the parliament. Thereupon Charles's ſcruples vaniſhed. As the Oxford parliament was intirely directed by the King, and as his Majeſty agreed to the the propoſing a peace to thoſe at Weſtminſter, it may eaſily be gueſſed that, in ſo doing, his intention was not to conclude it, except both houſes at Weſtminſter would have ſubmited to his terms. But the two houſes at Oxford had another view in this proceeding, viz. to lay a ſnare for the parliament at Weſtminſter, and ingage them, if poſſible, to treat with them, which would have been owning them for a parliament. However, they expected to reap ſome advantage even from their refuſal.

Letter from the parliament at Oxford to the earl of Eſſex. p. 339. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 566.

To this end, a letter was ſent to the earl of Eſſex, ſigned by the Prince of Wales, the duke of York, forty-three lords, and a hundred and eighteen members of the houſe of commons. In this letter it was ſaid, "That his Majeſty having "ſummoned them to attend him at Oxford, they "were aſſembled in obedience to his com- "mands: that his Majeſty was pleaſed to invite "them in the proclamation of ſummons, by gra- "ciouſly ſaying, 'His ſubjects ſhould ſee how "willing he was, as far as in him lay, to reſtore "the peace of the kingdom:' That this invitation "had not only been made good to them, ſeconded "by ſuch unqueſtionable demonſtrations of his "Majeſty's deep ſenſe of the miſeries and cala- "mities of his poor ſubjects in this unnatural war, "and of his moſt intire and paſſionate affections to "redeem them from that ſad and deplorable con- "dition, by all ways poſſible, conſiſtent with his "honor, or for the future ſafety of the kingdom: "'That as it were impiety to queſtion the ſince- "rity of them, ſo it were great want of duty and "faithfulneſs in us (his Majeſty having vouchſafed "to declare that he did call us to be witneſſes of "his actions and privy to his intentions) ſhould we "not ſatisfy and witneſs to all the world the aſſu- "rance we have of the piety and ſincerity of both.' "Adding——That, being ſatisfied of this truth, "they had yet hopes to be the happy inſtruments "of their country's redemption from the miſeries "of war, and reſtitution to the bleſſings of peace; "and were deſirous to believe, that his lordſhip, "howſoever ingaged, would co-operate with them "in the bleſſed work, by truly repreſenting to, and "induſtriouſly promoting with, thoſe by whom "he was truſted (1), their moſt earneſt deſire, "that ſome perſons be appointed on either part, "to treat of ſuch a peace as may yet redeem their "country from the brink of deſtruction."

Eſſex's anſwer. January 30. p. 567. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 340.

The earl of Eſſex returned this conciſe anſwer, "That the letter he had received, not being ad- "dreſſed to the two houſes of parliament, nor "any acknowledgment of them being therein, he "could not communicate it to them. That the "maintenance of the parliament of England, and "the privileges thereof was that for which him- "ſelf and his whole party were reſolved to ſpend "their blood, as being the foundation whereon "all the laws and liberties of the nation were "builded (2)."

Tho' the earl of Eſſex ſaid, he could not communicate the letter to the parliament, yet it was known that his anſwer had been concerted with a commitee of both houſes, ſtiled the Commitee of State. Wherefore his Majeſty, knowing thereby the intention of both houſes, believed he ſhould run no great hazard by ſending them a meſſage, in a letter to the earl of Eſſex, directed to the Lords and Commons of Parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter. This meſſage contained the uſual offers to treat of a peace, and appoint commiſſioners, if they would do the like on their part. Charles added, he took this ſtep by the advice of the lords and commons of parliament aſſembled at Oxford. Both houſes eaſily perceived the King was laying a ſnare for them, by puting them under a neceſſity, either of accepting his offer, in which caſe they ſhould indirectly own the lords and commons aſſembled at Oxford for a parliament, or of rejecting it, and ſo furniſhing him with a reaſon to upbraid them for refuſing to labor for a peace. But they little regarded this artifice, and for anſwer declared, they would never own ſuch members as had deſerted both houſes for a parliament, "And here- "upon (added they) we think ourſelves bound to "let your Majeſty know, that ſeeing the conti- "nuance of this parliament ſetled by a law (which, "as other laws of your kingdoms, your Majeſty "hath ſworn to maintain, as we are ſworn to our al- "legiance to your Majeſty, theſe obligations being "reciprocal) we muſt in duty, and accordingly "are reſolved, with our lives and fortunes to de- "fend and preſerve the juſt rights and full power "of this parliament; and do beſeech your Majeſty "to be aſſured, that your Majeſty's royal and "hearty concurrence with us herein will be the "moſt effectual and ready means of procuring a "firm and laſting peace in all your Majeſty's do- "minions, and of begeting a perfect underſtand- "ing between your Majeſty and your people, "without which your Majeſty's moſt earneſt pro- "feſſions, and our moſt real intentions concerning "the ſame, muſt neceſſarily be fruſtrated."

Declaration of both houſes to his Majeſty. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 570. Clarendon, Vol. II. 345.

Notice has been already taken of the views wherewith King Charles propoſed peace to both houſes at Weſtminſter, viz. that ſuch a general offer would not be accepted, as was eaſy to foreſee. This refuſal it was which made both houſes at Oxford exult, as if the bare propoſal of a peace had been a clear and evident demonſtration of their ſincere deſire to conclude a reaſonable one. They publiſhed on this occaſion a long declaration, ſo like thoſe ſet forth by his Majeſty on the ſame account, that it was not difficult to perceive it flowed from the ſame fountain. They likewiſe, not long after, publiſhed another, pretending to ſhew, that thoſe aſſembled at Oxford had been forced from the parliament by the leading members menaces and violence. In this declaration were repeated all the outrages and artifices practiſed, by the chiefs of that faction, to intimidate ſuch as would not conform to their ſentiments, and this, as they pretended, was the ſole and forcible reaſon of their withdrawing. Such was really King Charles's ſcheme; but it may be ſaid to be ill grounded: for moſt of thoſe members, who had deſerted the parliament, had not abſented themſelves 'till long after theſe pretended outrages, ſome by his Majeſty's expreſs order, others thro' apprehenſion of being puniſhed for attempting to raiſe commotions againſt the parliament: but care was taken not to intimate this particular in the declaration. After all, ſuppoſing ſome had withdrawn themſelves purely for fear, it is certain their number came far ſhort of thoſe who retired with the ſole view of ſerving his Majeſty. However, they were all confounded in one and the ſame claſs, as perſons expreſly driven from the parliament.

Some time after, both houſes at Weſtminſter publiſhed alſo a manifeſto, wherein they pretended to ſhew that, under the ſpecious color of propoſing peace, a ſnare was laid to ingage them tacitly to acknowledge themſelves not a parliament, but that the true parliament was at Oxford. They drew their proofs from ſundry letters, written from Oxford to the earl of Eſſex; from the expreſſions preſſions in his Majeſty's late meſſage; but more particularly, from a certain intercepted letter of lord Digby's, wherein his lordſhip ſays; "A point "which his Majeſty may not ſuffer them to gain, "without ſubverting the grounds and maxims of "all his late proceedings againſt them, and that "which he now goes upon by the advice of all "his nobility here, as you will perceive by this "incloſed proclamation (1), upon the effects "whereof all the eyes of the kingdom are fixed. Votes at Oxford againſt the Scots. Jan. 26. P. 564.

A day before the two houſes at Oxford wrote to the earl of Eſſex, to propoſe a peace, they voted, that the Scots, having entered the kingdom in ſuch hoſtile manner, had thereby denounced war againſt England, and that all thoſe Engliſh who aſſiſted them, ſhould be deemed as traitors and enemies to the ſtate.

P. 565.

March the twelfth, the ſame Oxford parliament voted, "That the lords and commons now re-"maining at Weſtminſter, are guilty of high-"treaſon; for raiſing forces under command of "the earl of Eſſex; for conſenting, and being "aſſiſting to the preſent coming of the Scots "into England; and for counterfeiting the great-"ſeal." But as votes did no hurt to the parliament at Weſtminſter, ſo neither were they of much advantage to Charles. He found a more real benefit from them, with regard to the affair for which he ſummoned this Oxford parliament, I mean, thoſe money aids he expected for ſupporting the war.

Means to procure money for his Majeſty. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 346.

This parliament was however ſtrangely imbaraſſed to deviſe how they might give his Majeſty ſome effectual aid, for that was the main affair. If as the only and true parliament, they had laid a general tax, King Charles would have hazarded meeting great oppoſition in levying money; all thoſe of the counties on his ſide not being ſatiſfied, that ſuch a parliament had any legal authority. In that caſe, he would be obliged to imploy force to compel ſuch as ſhould refuſe paying, which little ſuited his then circumſtances. Another method was therefore deviſed, doubtleſs ſuggeſted by the court. This was, to counſel his Majeſty to borrow, from the wealthieſt of his partiſans, a hundred thouſand pounds. To that purpoſe, the commons went into their reſpective counties, to take the number of thoſe deemed monied-men, and make a liſt, wherein were ſet down the quality and ability of each. Thoſe members being returned to Oxford, with their liſts, the taxes were proportioned; which done, Charles wrote circular letters to every particular perſon, to borrow of one, a hundred pounds, of another two hundred, promiſing to repay it as ſoon he was able, and not forgeting to ſay in theſe letters, that this loan was by advice of his parliament. Thus, tho' this parliament did not think themſelves ſufficiently authoriſed to impoſe a general tax, the particular perſons rated were no leſs obliged to furniſh what was laid on them, ſince theſe loans were made with the advice of both houſes. His Majeſty would have found leſs advantage in a general tax; for it was much eaſier to raiſe a hundred thouſand pounds upon particular rich men, than upon the whole nation. Now the point was, to procure, certainly and ſpeedily, the money wanted for the King's ſervice. Accordingly, this ſoon appeared to be the ſole motive of chuſing that method; for the Oxford parliament, underſtanding both houſes at Weſtminſter had laid a duty upon wine, beer, ale, and other commodities, which duty they ſtiled Exciſe, a word before unheard of in England (2), ſcrupled not laying a like injunction in the counties where the King's authority was acknowledged.

Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 580.

From that time, nothing remarkable was tranſacted by this parliament, which (ſiting 'till the 16th of April) was prorogued to October, and never met again. It ſerved only to procure King Charles a ſum of money, for which it was ſolely deſigned, and to exhibit a ſpectacle never before ſeen in England, viz. two parliaments, both at once holding their ſeſſions.

Oxford parliament prorogued. Rushworth. Vol. V. p. 601.

Three days before opening this parliament, the Scotiſh army entered England, notwithſtanding the ſeaſon, which ſhould ſeemingly have obſtructed their march (3). The marquis of Newcaſtle, who commanded for Charles in the North, hearing that the bad weather prevented not this army's advancing towards the borders, began likewiſe to march with his troops, and got to Newcaſtle, the ſecond of February (4). The Scots approaching that town, their general ordered it to be ſummoned; but the ſummons had no effect. He continued in that neighborhood the whole remainder of February, waiting for his artillery, which was coming by ſea. The twenty-eighth, he paſſed the Tyne, at ſome diſtance from Newcaſtle, (5) having left on the north-ſide of the town ſix regiments of infantry, with a body of cavalry, to awe the gariſon. The marquis, too weak to venture a battle, contented himſelf with haraſſing the Scots by frequent ſkirmiſhes, in order to retard their march; but he finally thought proper to retire into Durham, whither he was followed by the Scotiſh general, tho' with great inconveniency, being greatly in want of forage.

No ſooner was lord Fairfax informed, that the marquis had directed his march Northwards, but he determined on bending his courſe towards York; and, to that end, ordered his ſon, ſir Thomas Fairfax, to meet him at a certain place, with the party he commanded, that they might act in conjunction. The marquis of Newcaſtle returns to York. April 13. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 619.

The marquis of Newcaſtle learned theſe unhappy tidings at Durham, the Scots being then within two miles of the place. He apprehended that lord Fairfax, after his victory, would attack York, or at leaſt march directly towards Durham, to put himſelf between the two armies. For this reaſon, he ſuddenly reſolved on retiring to York, as well to ſecure himſelf as that city, which would otherwiſe have been in the utmoſt danger.

AN' 1644. p. 620. Ludlow, Vol. I. p. 173.

It ſoon appeared, that the marquis had taken this reſolution very ſeaſonably; for, the twentieth of April, i. e. nine days after the Selby fight (1), lord Fairfax joined the Scots at Tadcaſter, whence the two generals agreed to ſet out for the ſiege of York. But as that city was too ſpacious to be inveſted by the two armies on all ſides, particularly towards the river, croſs which the marquis had made a bridge of boats (2), they deſired the earl of Mancheſter, general of the Eaſtern aſſociated counties forces, to advance to this ſiege. Theſe generals, 'till the earl of Mancheſter's arrival, held the city blocaded to the ſouthward of the river Ouſe. I ſhall interrupt for a moment the account of York's ſiege, to ſpeak of the parliament army's ill ſucceſs, at Newark.

Meldrum defeated at Newark by Prince Rupert. March 22. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 307. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 356. Common's War.

While the marquis of Newcaſtle was in the North, obſerving the Scotiſh army, lord Willoughby of Parham, and ſir John Meldrum, with above five thouſand of the parliament's troops, beſieged Newark, a conſiderable town in Notinghamſhire, where Charles had ſtationed a gariſon. So ſoon as his Majeſty had thereof notice, he ſent orders to Prince Rupert to attempt its relief. His ſaid Highneſs, then at Cheſter, inſtantly put himſelf on the march, and, being joined by other troops, made a body ſeven thouſand ſtrong, wherewith he advanced towards Newark. Meldrum, who commanded alone at the ſiege, lord Willoughby being gone elſewhere, reſolved to fight the Prince, and to that purpoſe drew up his forces at a ſmall diſtance from the town. The twenty-firſt of March, there was a ſharp conflict, particularly at a bridge, by which Meldrum had reſolved to retreat, in caſe of neceſſity. The bridge was vigorouſly attacked, and as bravely defended. Mean while, when the fight was over, Meldrum, finding himſelf too weak to renew it next day, reſolved to retreat over the bridge during night; but he found the guard he left there had deſerted, and the bridge in the enemy's poſſeſſion (3): ſo Meldrum, not being able to retreat, and perceiving himſelf ſurrounded with the King's forces, ſent his Highneſs a trumpet to deſire a parley. It was agreed, that the foot ſhould march away with their ſwords, colors and drums; all the officers with their arms, horſes and baggage; and the troopers and dragoons with their ſwords, horſes and colors: but he was forced to deliver all his ordnance and ammunition, with about three thouſand muſkets.

Rupert, after this expedition, whereby he acquired great honor, returned into Shropſhire, and thence went to Lancaſhire, to relieve the counteſs of Derby, who, during eighteen weeks, was beſieged in Latham-houſe, and made a gallant defenſe againſt a body of two thouſand men (4). The Prince, in his way to Latham, took by ſtorm Stopworth, a ſmall town in Cheſhire. While he was advancing towards Latham, the beſiegers diſlodged, and part of them, under command of colonel Rigby, marched away to reinforce the gariſon of Bolton, in Lancaſhire, which was in great danger. His Highneſs purſued them, and, without giving them time to recollect, carried the town by ſtorm.

Here he received a letter from his Majeſty, ordering him to march with all ſpeed to the relief of York, which was now beſieged. Charles told him, in this letter, "that his affairs were in ſo very ill a ſtate, "that it would not be enough, tho' his Highneſs "raiſed the ſiege of York, if he had not likewiſe "beaten the Scotiſh army;" which expreſſions ingaged the Prince to fight a battle which proved extremely fatal to his royal uncle.

He is ordered by the King to relieve York. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 390, 396.

I left York blocaded by the Engliſh and Scotiſh armies, commanded by lord Fairfax and the earl of Leven, 'till the earl of Mancheſter ſhould join them. Mancheſter who was general of the ſeven Eaſtern aſſociated counties, had raiſed an army of fourteen thouſand horſe, foot and dragoons. With theſe troops, the ſaid earl had already done the parliament great ſervice. In the laſt campain, he had taken the town of Lynn, and, in the begining of this, had poſſeſſed himſelf of Lincoln. As diverſe of the leading members had thoughts of puting him in the earl of Eſſex's place, occaſion was taken from the ſervices he had performed to make a conſtant proviſion for his army. To that end, by an ordinance of both houſes, May the fifteenth, 1644, each of the ſeveral aſſociated counties were charged and rated at a certain weekly ſum for the maintenance of his troops; after which he received orders to join the two other armies, to beſiege York in concert. The parliament had alſo taken care for the ſubſiſtence of the earl of Eſſex's (5) and ſir William Waller's forces; ſo that, in May, they had on foot five armies, beſide the troops diſperſed in ſeveral counties, and in gariſon.

(2) The caſe was this: The marquis having a great ſtrength of horſe, and the advantage of a bridge over the river, could eaſily tranſport them to either ſide in a ſhort time: ſo that if the beſiegers divided their forces, the river being betwixt them, he might fall on the weaker, and the reſt would not be able to relieve them. The river Ouſe runs North and South quite thro' the city, divided into two parts, which are joined by a ſtone bridge.

(3) Our author has here confounded two bridges. That which was attacked was a bridge of boats, over which Meldrum's horſe were drawn by his order into the iſland. This bridge Prince Rupert indeavored to recover, but was repulſed. The other was Muſcome bridge, over which he deſigned to retreat, but his guard deſerting broke it down.

Siege of York. June 3. The marquis amuses the besiegers. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 369. Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 624, 625, &c.

On Sunday the thirtieth of June, the besiegers had certain notice, that Prince Rupert was advancing at the head of an army *, which had greatly increased in their march, as well by the troops drawn from several garisons, as by Goring's cavalry, so that this army was not inferior to those three imployed at the siege. The three generals, after a short consultation, thought it adviseable to raise the siege, and join their armies, whether, as some affirm, with design to give battle, or to avoid it, as others pretend. Howsoever it be, they posted themselves on Marston-moor †. But tho' Prince Rupert must have indeed passed that way to come at them with his army, they however left two sides of York open, that provisions and ammunition, and even troops by small parties, might be conveyed in. Had the Prince's design been only to relieve York he had already effected it, and had only to remain in his post, and keep the enemies at bay, 'till all necessaries had been sent into the city. But that same day, coming to York with a guard of two hundred horse, he confered with the marquis of Newcastle, or rather signified to him, that he intended to fight, according to his Majesty's express orders. As Rupert was excessively haughty, he made not to the marquis any manner of apology upon the authority he assumed, in resolving to give battle, contrary to the opinion of that noble peer, who maintained it not to be any way requisite in the present juncture, and the rather, as he expected five thousand men, who were coming from the North to his assistance. Moreover, his Highness made no scruple to command the forces in York to be ready to join him next morning, in order to ingage; and all this without saying a word of it to the marquis; nothwithstanding, these forces had been by him levied, and all along commanded with great reputation: beside, this nobleman's birth and merit seemed to require a greater regard from his Highness. Possibly, it never entered the marquis's thoughts to desire a sight of his Majesty's express order, or else he believed it would be affronting the Prince to shew any doubt of such order. However this was, he told him, he was in all things ready to obey his Highness, who might dispose of his troops as he pleased, and for his own part, would be contented to charge in the battle as voluntier. His dissatisfaction was farther increased, when having asked Rupert, what service he would be pleased to command him, the Prince answered, he would begin no action upon the enemy 'till early next morning, and desired him to repose himself 'till then. Thus had Rupert the sole management of the intended battle, without consulting the marquis. Tho' he had ordered Newcastle's forces in York to join his onw army, it does not appear that he had assigned any command or post to that marquis; perhaps, because he said, he would be in the battle as a voluntier. It cannot be denied, this behavior was very severe to a nobleman who had constantly expressed for King Charles a zeal and affection not to be surpassed, nor perhaps equalled.

CHARLES I An' 1644.

At night, the three parliament-generals, having considered that the place was relieved, and thinking Prince Rupert had no farther design than to lay in provisions, resolved on marching to Tadcaster, Cawood and Selby, as well to preserve the East-riding, as to hinder York from being thence furnished with provisions. Accordingly, they began their march early in the morning, the Scots leading the van: but about nine, they had intelligence, that Rupert was approaching with his army; and indeed he was advanced, with five thousand horse, very nigh their rear.

The parliament-generals retire. July 2. p. 632—634.

Prince Rupert forces them to ingage.

Hereupon they were obliged to draw up speedily, and call back their van, which made all possible haste to re-join them. Fortunately for them, the infantry, which his Highness had drawn out of York, could not come up with his army 'till noon, and this gave the Scots time to re-join the rest of their army, which they had left in the morning. The armies were both drawn up about two after noon: but there was between them a deep and large ditch, which neither cared to pass, for fear of giving the enemy too much advantage. For this reason, they stood viewing one another above two hours, each expecting the other to begin the charge.

Prince Rupert himself headed the left wing (1), consisting of five thousand horse. The right wing was commanded by sir Charles Lucas, with colonel Hurry, and the main body by general Goring. It appears not that the marquis of Newcastle had any command in this action. The parliament's right wing opposite to Prince Rupert, was led by sir Thomas Fairfax; the left by the earl of Manchester, assisted by his lieutenant-general Oliver Cromwell. In the main batallia, towards the right, was lord Fairfax, and general Leven towards the left. Finally, between six and seven in the evening, the parliament-generals gave the signal, and marched to the enemies. I shall not undertake to describe this battle, because, in all the accounts I have seen, I meet with so little order and clearness, that I cannot expect to give a satisfactory idea of it to such of my readers as understand these matters. I shall content myself with relating one remarkable circumstance, beside the success in general. The left wing of the King's army, commanded by Prince Rupert, was intirely routed by the parliament's right-wing, while the King's right-wing had the same advantage over the left of the parliament. The two victorious wings, after chacing their enemies, returned to the field of battle, and, I know not what by accident, met face to face, so that each stood on the same ground which the enemy possessed when the battle began. Here the fight was renewed, and maintained on both sides with great warmth and vigor, 'till at length night approaching, the King's cavalry were put to flight, and pursued as long as day would permit. It was probably then that Rupert's infantry were likewise routed. I say, probably, because in the description of this battle it does not appear what the foot did. But this is not the only instance wherein we are left in the dark, when we read descriptions of battles drawn by historians. They are generally made by persons who have not the least notion of military affairs, and who, by dweling on some frivolous circumstances, Rupert's army routed.

(1) Rushworth (Vol. V. p. 633.) says, the Prince led the right wing, and sir Charles Lucas the left: and that the earl of Manchester and Cromwell commanded the left of the enemy. The King's forces consisted of 14,000 foot, and 9,000 horse, and about twenty-five pieces of ordnance. The parliament's army did not exceed that number. Oliver Cromwell was hard pressed by the Prince's horse, and wounded above the shoulders, but at length he broke thro'. Lord Holles affirms, that Oliver behaved, in this battle, in a very cowardly manner; and that those who did then most service, were, major-generals Lesley and Crawford, and sir Thomas Fairfax. pass over those which might give the intelligent reader clear ideas. It suffices therefore to say, that the Prince's army was pursued within a mile of York, whither they retired in the night. Those peasants, who were commanded to bury the dead, gave out that they interred four thousand one hundred and fifty bodies. It was reported that three thousand of Rupert's men were killed: but the conquerors affirmed, they lost not above three hundred (1).

Rushworth. Vol. V. p. 635.

Tho' Prince Rupert had ever been victorious where he had commanded in chief, it is not very surprising that he should once be defeated; this is a misfortune incident to the greatest generals. But his resolution to retire with his army, on the morrow, must needs appear unaccountable. His cavalry had not suffered much, because they had taken to flight betimes, at least those of the left-wing, commanded by himself; and his foot were also in good condition, the greatest storm having fallen on the marquis of Newcastle's. He might therefore have defended York, and waited the King's order upon this fatal occurrence. So, this extraordinary resolution can scarce be imputed but to excess of shame and indignation, which hindered him from considering how prejudicial it would be to the King his uncle's affairs. He sent the marquis of Newcastle notice of his design, just as that nobleman was sending him word, that he was instantly going to quit the kingdom. They both put their resolutions in practise. The marquis repaired that very day to Scarborough, and imbarked for Hamburgh: the Prince left York, and marched towards Chester with the remains of his army. It is easy to guess why the marquis of Newcastle quited the King's service, after having been so unworthily treated by Prince Rupert. He doubtless believed he could not with honor resume his former command, having been deemed incapable to serve his Majesty on this important occasion: nay, very possibly, he imagined Rupert would not have behaved to him in so haughty and rude a manner, had he not thought he should be supported. However, all that Prince could afterwards produce in his vindication, was King Charles's above-mentioned letter, which he understood in a sense the King himself had never thought of (2). It may therefore be affirmed, that his commiting so many errors successively, was intirely owing to his extreme haughtiness.

York taken. July 15. p. 390. Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 637.

The parliament-generals improved their victory, and the dissension of their enemies. They returned to their stations before York, which was left to the discretion of sir Thomas Glemham, the governor, who, seeing himself unable long to resist, surrendered this important place upon honorable terms. They were no sooner in possession of York, but the three armies separated. Lord Fairfax, with his forces, remained at York, as governor. The earl of Manchester marched towards Lincoln, not to be remote, without necessity, from the associated counties, whose troops he commanded. The earl of Leven, with the Scotish army, marched Northward to join the earl of Calendar, who was advancing with a strong reinforcement from Scotland. When these forces were joined, he laid siege to Newcastle, which surrendered at discretion, towards the close of October (3). Thus Marston-moor battle lost King Charles all the North, which hitherto had given the parliament-forces a powerful diversion. But this was not the whole mischief this Prince had to apprehend. The three victorious armies menaced joining, in the heart of England, those of the earl of Essex and sir William Waller, and reducing at once all the places which were still in his power. This was the more to be dreaded as, when he heard of the defeat of his army at Marston-moor, he was himself marching to relieve the West, where Essex then was with an army which the royalists of those quarters were not able to withstand. This is what I am now to explain, and withal touch on what passed at Oxford, while the Northern armies were in action.

Extraordinary preparations of the parliament, for the campain of 1644. March 26,30. Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 653.

The parliament, by their extraordinary preparations in the begining of the year 1644, seem to have intended a speedy conclusion of the war. Beside the armies of lord Fairfax and Scotland, and the earl of Manchester's which was paid by the Eastern counties, a new regulation was made, late in March, for the maintenance of seven thousand five hundred foot, and three thousand horse, to be commanded by the earl of Essex. At the same time, by another ordinance, the four Southern associated counties, viz. Kent, Sussex, Surrey and Hampshire, were to maintain three thousand six hundred foot, twelve hundred horse, and five hundred dragoons, under sir William Waller's command. These were not new armies; they subsisted before the regulation: but the business was to recruit them, complete the number fixed by parliament, and setle the necessary weekly defray of their subsistence.

Resolution to send Waller into the West:

Tho' sir William Waller was worsted at the battle of Roundway-down, the two houses, far from losing their esteem for him, resolved to send him into the West, with a force able to withstand Prince Maurice, who met with no farther opposition in those quarters. Charles, having notice of this design, resolved to indeavor, not only hindering Waller's march into the West, but also breaking the association of the four Southern counties, where he had many friends, and even hoped to procure an association of these counties in his favor. To that purpose, he gave lord Hopton an army, consisting of troops drawn from diverse garisons, and of two regiments of foot lately arrived at Bristol from Ireland (4). These forces were no sooner assembled, than lord Hopton posted himself at Winchester, where sir John Berkley brought him two regiments he had newly raised in Devonshire, and the King sent him a detachment of a thousand men, commanded by sir Jacob Ashley. All these troops united formed an army of four thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse (5), with which he determined on marching into Sussex. Waller, who was then quartered about Farnham, assembled his forces and faced the enemy: but after a few slight skirmishes, he retired into Farnham castle, whence he took a journey to London, representing to the parliament his want of supplies, without which it would not be possible to perform what had been injoined him.

Waller retakes it. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 364, 365.

Waller was returned to Farnham with a ſtrong reinforcement, he rejoined the reſt of his army.

Waller's journey to London anſwered his expectation. Beſide a brigade of Londoners, under major-general Brown, he procured an order of parliament to the earl of Eſſex, to ſend him from his army a thouſand horſe, under conduct of ſir William Balfour. He was no ſooner returned to Farnham with theſe ſupplies, but he marched all night, and at day-break beat up of one lord Hopton's quarters, at Alton, and carried off priſoners colonel Boles's regiment of foot (1); a troop or two of horſe, which were in the ſame quarters, having timely taken to flight. Then he marched directly to Arundel-caſtle, and made the gariſon priſoners. Here the learned mr. Chillingworth was taken, and within few days died.

Battle of Alresford, wherein Hopton is defeated. March 29. p. 366, 367. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 654.

King Charles, hearing of the ſupplies ſent Waller, diſpatched away a reinforcement to lord Hopton. The earl of Forth, his Majeſty's general (2), would go himſelf, but refuſed the command which lord Hopton offered to reſign to him. Hopton, having then an army about eight thouſand ſtrong, reſolved to give Waller battle, and begun his march with that intent, at the very time Waller was advancing towards him with the ſame reſolution. The two armies met between Farnham and Wincheſter, on Cheriton-down, near Alresford, where the battle was fought the twenty-ninth of March. Lord Hopton was defeated and forced to retire to Reading, and afterwards to Oxford (3). Waller marched to Wincheſter, and became maſter of the city, but did not think proper to beſiege the caſtle*, becauſe he had elſewhere more important affairs, as will ſoon appear. Lord Clarendon pretends, the loſs ſuſtained by Waller at Alresford hindered him from improving his advantage, and marching into the Weſt, as he had reſolved. But it may be affirmed, this was not what prevented his taking the Weſtern route: it was rather owing to ſome reſolves of the parliament, by whom he was recalled to London, after having diſmiſſed the auxiliary regiments of that city, and Kent, which were alſo come to join him.

Reſolution to beſiege Oxford.

Both houſes, perceiving that, by the King's late loſs at Alresford, his army was diſcouraged and conſiderably leſſened; that moreover, they had ſufficient forces in the North to have nothing to fear from the marquis of Newcaſtle, who was ſhut up in York, reſolved to beſiege Oxford, where the King was with his army. So, having relinquiſhed, or ſuſpended, the deſign of ſending Waller into the Weſt, they labored, with all poſſible diligence, to put the two armies of Eſſex and Waller on the footing ſetled by their ordinance, that they might jointly act againſt Oxford.

His Majeſty had all along ſuppoſed Waller's deſign was to march Weſtwards. He had therefore aſſembled his forces at Marlborough, and afterwards poſted himſelf at Newbury, where he had remained ſome time, 'till he could better penetrate the intentions of his enemies. But having at length found the parliament had altered their meaſures, he came to Reading, and cauſed the fortifications to be demoliſhed, in order to ſtrengthen his army with the gariſon, conſiſting of two thouſand five hundred men. He alſo ordered Prince Rupert to join him: but afterwards permited him to relieve Latham-houſe, where the counteſs of Derby was beſieged. With the Reading gariſon, his army was increaſed to eight thouſand five hundred foot, and four thouſand horſe: but being ſtill ignorant of the enemy's drift, he judged proper to retire to Oxford with his whole army.

Mean while the parliament, who had for ſome time found means to take their reſolutions with more ſecreſy than before, perceiving Eſſex's and Waller's armies ready to march, ſent to each a ſupply of four thouſand two hundred of the London militia: ſo, Eſſex's army conſiſted of twelve thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; and Waller's of ſeven thouſand foot and fifteen hundred horſe and dragoons. Theſe two generals had orders to march ſeparately, and beſiege Oxford, in caſe Charles continued there; but if he went thence, Eſſex was ordered to follow him with his forces, and Waller to march into the Weſt, according to the firſt project. They departed London, the fourteenth and fifteenth of May, to put themſelves at the head of their reſpective armies, and forthwith ſteered their courſe towards Oxford. p. 668, 670.

Abington abandoned and poſſeſſed by Eſſex. Ibid. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 374.

King Charles had poſted the greateſt part of his infantry at Abington, in order to ſtop the enemies, and have time to conſider what meaſures he ſhould take, in caſe they really intended to beſiege Oxford, which he ſtill queſtioned. As Abington could not be eaſily defended but on the Eaſt-ſide, and he was unwilling to run any unneceſſary hazard, he had ordered general Wilmot to make a vigorous defenſe, if attacked on that ſide, but if on the Weſt from Wantage and Farrington, to relinquiſh the place. But, whether the order was not clear and full, or for ſome other reaſon, Wilmot, at the enemy's approach*, immediately retired to Oxford, and the earl of Eſſex inſtantly entered Abington. His Majeſty, finding the ſiege of Oxford was reſolved, had but one way to hinder it, which was to defend the paſſes of the rivers Iſis and Cherwell, which run on the Weſt and Eaſt ſides of the city; and, to that end, he quartered his cavalry near the Iſis, and his infantry towards the Cherwell. As the parliament-armies motion intirely regard the ſituation of Oxford and the adjacent country; and as, without this knowledge, ſcarce any one particular would be intelligible, I ſhall not enter on a detail of circumſtances, which to me ſeem not abſolutely neceſſary, but content myſelf with ſaying, that Waller finally found means to gain the paſs at New-bridge over the Iſis, which inabled him to fall upon the rear of the King's infantry, who were defending the Cherwell (4). Charles thereupon drew all his forces into Oxford and to the North of that city, with thoughts of providing for the ſafety of his perſon, not judging it proper to ſuffer himſelf to be ſhut up. There was no time to loſe; for ſcarce were his Majeſty's troops retired, when Eſſex paſſed the Cherwell, at Goſworth-bridge, with his army. So that Prince, giving orders to his horſe, and a ſmall body of foot, to wait for him at a certain place, left Oxford the third of June, about nine at night, and ſafely paſſed between the two parliament-armies. He was out of all danger of purſuit before the news of his retreat reached the enemies, and at laſt got ſafe

June 6. The parliament-generals drop the deſign of beſieging Oxford.

The two generals were extremely ſurpriſed, when they underſtood his Majeſty had eſcaped them: but it was too late to hope overtaking him. Mean while, the city of Oxford being well ſtored with proviſions and ammunition, and King Charles having left there almoſt all his infantry, they did not think fit to beſiege it, and the rather, as they had no orders ſo to do, except the King remained there. The parliament's intention was that, in caſe his Majeſty evacuated Oxford, Eſſex ſhould follow him with his army; and Waller, with his, take care of the Weſtern affairs: but the earl, for ſome unknown reaſon, reverſed this order, and would himſelf march into the Weſt: and when Waller urged the parliament's orders, Eſſex poſitively commanded him, as his general, to obey; whereto the other could make no reply: ſo the earl immediately began his march Weſtwards. The parliament were highly offended at Eſſex's diſobedience, and ſent him orders, which reached him at Saliſbury, to return, follow the King, and leave the Weſtern expedition to Waller. But the Earl, inſtead of complying, wrote to the commitee of war (1), with the reaſons of his conduct, ſubſcribing his letter, Your innocent, tho' ſuſpected ſervant, Eſſex. Whether both houſes were ſatisfied with the earl's reaſons, or deemed it proper not to inſenſe him at ſuch a juncture, they ſuffered him to purſue his route, which he did by ſlow and eaſy marches, 'till he entered Devonſhire.

The Queen had, ſince April, been at Exeter, the capital of that county, where ſhe was delivered of Princeſs Henrietta, about a fortnight or three weeks before Eſſex's approach. As ſoon as ſhe heard of his entering Devonſhire, ſhe ſent and deſired a ſafe-conduct to retire to Briſtol (2). His ſaid lordſhip replied; if her Majeſty would pleaſe to go to London, he would have the honor to wait on her thither; but could not give her a ſafe-conduct to Briſtol, without the expreſs order of both houſes. Hereupon ſhe withdrew into Cornwal, and ſome time after went to France, with a convoy of warlike ſhips, ſent her by the Prince of Orange.

July 14.

Prince Maurice had been, ſince the twentieth of April, before the little town of Lime, which made a more obſtinate defenſe than was expected. This and Plymouth, were almoſt the only places in the Weſt which ſided with the two houſes. It was therefore very neceſſary for the parliament to have, in thoſe parts, forces capable of reviving the courage of their friends, who had received no aſſiſtance ſince Maurice's arrival. At the approach of Eſſex, who was now advanced to Dorcheſter, his Highneſs raiſed the ſiege of Lime, and retired to Exeter. The ſame day, Eſſex poſſeſſed himſelf of Dorcheſter. Then, he detached ſir William Balfour, who took Weymouth, whither Eſſex inſtantly repaired. He had ſome thoughts of attacking Exeter, and actually took that route: but conſidering that Prince Maurice was there with his whole army, he was apprehenſive of loſing too much time in the ſiege, and halted ſome days at Chard, and thence marched to Tiverton. Hereupon, Maurice ſent a detachment from Exeter, with orders to ſecure Barnſtable: but the inhabitants ſhut the gates againſt them, and inſtantly wrote to the earl of Eſſex, to come and take poſſeſſion of the town, which was accordingly done by lord Roberts. Here was taken captain Howard, who (being formerly lieutenant to captain Pym) had deſerted to the King, with nineteen troopers; for which, being now tried by a council of war, he was condemned and executed. Upon this, Prince Maurice cauſed to be hanged Turpin, a ſea-captain, taken priſoner in attempting to relieve Exeter, when the earl of Stamford was therein beſieged. He being indicted for levying arms againſt the King, was by judges Heath, Forſter, Banks, and ſerjeant Glanvil, condemned, but hitherto reprieved, by reaſon of the conſequences. Both houſes were violently inſenſed at this repriſal, conſidering the difference between a priſoner of war, and a deſerter: wherefore, having in their cuſtody ſerjeant Glanvil, who who had lately quited the King's party, and returned to London, they ordered him to be impeached of high-treaſon. Soon after, the royaliſts hanged fourteen clothiers, at Woodhouſe in Wiltſhire (3), and the parliament cauſed execution to be done upon eight of the Iriſh, who had been taken priſoners in ſome action. Such are the ſad effects of civil wars. Theſe executions gave occaſion to the parliament, in Auguſt following, to erect a court-martial, to which were given very ſevere inſtructions, chiefly with reſpect to deſerters. About mid-July, Taunton-dean was taken for the parliament, by a party of the gariſon of Lime.

I am for a while obliged to interrupt my narrative of the Weſtern affairs, to touch on what King Charles did after his happy eſcape from Oxford.

He arrived, the ſixth of June, at Worceſter with his little army; but ſtayed there only a few days, hearing Waller was marching that way. Leaving Worceſter, he made ſeveral marches and counter marches, to deceive the vigilance of his enemy, not being ſtrong enough to venture to expect him. At length, having made a ſhew of bending his courſe for Shrewſbury, Waller doubted not but his deſign was to join Prince Rupert, who was ſtill in thoſe quarters: for this was before the battle of Marſton-moor. He thought it therefore very important to march before, and poſt himſelf between the King and Shrewſbury, in order to hinder his joining the Prince. Charles was well pleaſed at having deceived Waller. So ſoon as he knew Waller expected him upon that route, he feigned to take it in good earneſt, but ſudddenly turning about, inſtead of continuing his march towards Shrewſbury, took the road to Oxford, and left Waller in his poſt without any poſſibility of overtaking him. When he came near Oxford, he was joined by the reſt of his army, left there when he quited that city. Then, no longer fearing Waller, ſince he was ſtronger than he, he went and quartered in Buckinghamſhire, without any other deſign than to give the enemy battle, if needful.

Waller, thus circumvented, did however approach the King, and at length their armies were in ſight, with the river Cherwell between them. Waller drew up on a very advantageous ground, preſuming his Majeſty would paſs the river to attack him, and thereby give him opportunity to ingage with advantage. But Charles, to draw him from his poſt, feigned to march Northward, and accordingly advanced into Northamptonſhire, leaving a ſtrong guard at Cropedy-bridge, to hinder the enemies from paſſing, and following him in the rear. While on his march, he had intelligence, that a body of three hundred horſe was marching to join Waller, within two miles of the van of his army, and was told they might be eaſily cut off, if the army mended pace: whereupon orders were ſent to the van, and main body, to advance faſter. As ſoon as Waller perceived there was a large diſtance between Charles's rear, and the reſt of his army, he detached a thouſand horſe to paſs the river, at a ford a mile below, and himſelf, with fifteen hundred horſe, a thouſand foot and eleven pieces of cannon, attacked Cropedy-bridge, took it, and paſſed his troops: which done, he fell on the King's rear; but was repulſed, with loſs of many of his men, and part of his cannon. This is all can be gathered, with any clearneſs, from the accounts of this battle (1). The detachment, which I ſaid paſſed the ford, had much a like ſucceſs. Waller being thus baffled, and forced to repaſs the river, drew up his men on a hill, and there waited Charles's motions. As it was yet only three after noon, his Majeſty, believing the enemies were diſcouraged with their bad ſucceſs, ordered Cropedy-bridge, and the ford, to be attacked by two great detachments. One was worſted at the bridge with great loſs on Charles's ſide. The other gained the ford; but all could be done, was to maintain it, in vain expecting, 'till it was near duſk, that the firſt detachment would recover the bridge. Night coming on, they mutually retired, Waller remaining maſter of the two paſſes.

King Charles was ſo prepoſſeſſed with a notion, that the enemies army was utterly diſpirited, that he determined on offering them pardon by a herald, imagining it would be immediately accepted, and Waller quite abandoned. In this belief, he ſent Waller a trumpet, deſiring a ſafe-conduct for a gentleman to deliver a gracious meſſage from his Majeſty. Waller replied, he had no power to receive any meſſage without permiſſion from the parliament, to whom his Majeſty was to make application. The two armies faced each other for two whole days, ſtanding in the ſame poſture, when both drew off, each taking a different route. (2). To all appearance, Waller did not, after this loſs, think himſelf in a condition to go any more in queſt of the King, who was ſuperior to him in number. As it was about this time, the report of Prince Rupert's defeat at Marſton-moor was ſpread, Waller doubtleſs thought, there was no great neceſſity to hazard a ſecond battle, ſince the King would probably be not a little imbaraſſed. When he afterwards underſtood his Majeſty to be marching Weſtward, he gave himſelf ſtill leſs trouble as to any attempt that Prince might make, ſince it was the earl of Eſſex's buſineſs to get off as he pleaſed. There was not between them a ſufficient union, for Waller to be much concerned at what might happen to that general. Perhaps alſo, his not being able to follow his Majeſty, who was advancing againſt the earl, was the reaſon why he diſmiſſed all the London auxiliaries, which, added to his loſs at Cropedy, diſabled him from acting 'till re-inforced.

Charles marches Weſtwards. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 387.

King Charles, who at the opening of this campain was ſtraitened, did within a month after find himſelf much at eaſe. Of the two armies which had attacked him, one was unable to hurt him, and the other was gone into the Weſt, where he himſelf was very ſtrong. Firſt, he was maſter of all the fortified towns, Plymouth excepted. Secondly, he had at Briſtol a large gariſon, part whereof might be drawn out on occaſion. Thirdly, almoſt all the gentry of the Weſtern counties were well-affected to him: there were only the lower claſs of people, who were divided between him and the parliament, but who yet were always ready to join with the ſtrongeſt. Finally, Prince Maurice had at Exeter, and in its neghborhood, four thouſand men, which ſuccor could be eaſily brought him by the North of Devonſhire, and the earl of Eſſex not be able to prevent it. All theſe conſiderations determined him to march Weſtward, to give Eſſex battle, if opportunity offered. He had ſcarce begun his march, when he received the ill news of what paſſed at York, which confirmed him in his reſolution. He perceived that, if he remained in the middle of England, where he had few friends or fortified towns, the three parliament armies, which were now ſeparated, would not fail to re-join, and then he ſhould be too weak to make head againſt their united forces.

Charles I An' 1644.

Soon as his Majeſty had thus reſolved, he thereof gave notice to Prince Maurice, that he might be ready to join him, and by the ſame expreſs ſent lord Hopton orders, to draw what men he could out of Wales, and lead them to Briſtol, that he might meet him on the way with thoſe troops, and as many more as could poſſibly be ſpared from that gariſon. So Charles, making eaſy marches, in order to give the Welſh troops time to join him, came the fifteenth of July to Bath, whence he two days after departed, and finally arrived at Exeter. When all the troops he ſummoned had joined him, he ſaw himſelf at the head of a body much more numerous than Eſſex's army.

His meſſage, to both houſes for peace, not anſwered. July 4. p. 687.

Five days after Cropedy-bridge fight, his Majeſty, being at Eveſham, cauſed to be drawn up a meſſage to the parliament for peace, a copy whereof was ſent to the earl of Eſſex, by the marquis of Hertford, to be communicated to both houſes; with intimation, that the French agent had the original to deliver, if required. This meſſage, directed "To the Lords and Commons of Parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter," contained a general offer to treat of peace; and if commiſſioners ſhould be ſent him, he would grant them a ſafe-conduct. The two houſes, ever jealous of Charles, imagined ſome artifice lay concealed in ſending them only a copy of the meſſage, and that his aim was to ingage them to demand the original of the French agent. Beſide, they did not, by the ſuperſcription of this meſſage, conceive themſelves to be owned as the two houſes of parliament, and therefore fancied his Majeſty aimed at reſerving to himſelf the power of ſaying, that he did not acknowledge them for the real parliament of England (3); and indeed he ought not, according to his principles, ſince he had publiſhed againſt them the above-cited declaration. They therefore reſolved neither to take any notice of the meſſage, nor return any anſwer.

"victory

CHARLES I AN' 1644.

" victory was the only means left to reſtore peace " to the nation; that bleſſed peace which he had " ſo often ſought for from them at Weſtminſter, " and which they had ſcornfully rejected. But " (continued he) when I mention peace, I would " be underſtood to intend that peace, which is " builded upon ſuch foundations as are moſt likely " to render it firm and ſtable; wherein God's true " religion may be beſt ſecured from the danger " of popery, ſectaries, and innovations; the " crown may poſſeſs thoſe juſt prerogatives which " may inable me to protect and govern my " people according to law; and the ſubjects be " confirmed in thoſe rights which they have de- " rived from their forefathers, and which I have " granted them in parliament; to which I ſhall " always be ready to add ſuch new graces, as I " ſhall find moſt conducive to their happineſs. " This is the peace which I labor for, wherein I " may juſtly expect your beſt aſſiſtance with your " hearts, and hands, and purſes."

Remark.

In order to a clear underſtanding of this Prince's meaning, not only on this, but abſolutely on all other the like occaſions, it muſt be conſidered, the parliament denied not, that a King of England ought, according to the national laws, to injoy ſuch prerogatives as King Charles himſelf demanded: but they affirmed, it ought to be for the nation's welfare, and not for its deſtruction. They pretended, that Charles had abuſed theſe prerogatives, to deſtroy the ſubject's rights, and from thence drew this inference, that it was indiſpenſibly neceſſary to incapacitate him from abuſing them any longer; which could be effected only by depriving him of part of the prerogatives he had abuſed. They maintained only, that this Prince's bare word alone could not be relied on, and there needed a ſtronger ſenſe to ſecure the laws. King Charles, on his part, did not deny his having made ill uſe of his power: but he had repaired the miſchief he did, and proteſted, his intention was to govern thenceforwards according to the laws of the land. What therefore was the ground of this war? Why, the parliament would not truſt to the King's word; and the King refuſed to give other ſecurity. When therefore Charles ſo frequently offered peace, on condition he ſhould be reſtored to all his prerogatives, excepting thoſe he had departed from in this parliament, far from ſhewing, by theſe offers, that he was ſincerely deſirous of peace, he rather demonſtrated, that nothing could ſatisfy him but intire victory, whether by arms or treaty. Contrariwiſe, when the parliament ſeemed to wiſh for peace, but on condition that the King ſhould be diveſted of his prerogatives, was not this in reality to wiſh for war, ſince it was deſiring to ſecure by a treaty an advantage which their arms had hitherto rendered very uncertain? We muſt not therefore be miſ-led by a ſound of the word peace, which was, as appears, a very ambiguous term, and whereof both ſides, his Majeſty eſpecially, made parade to dazzle the people. I am in hopes this remark will be of uſe to explain many the like paſſages of this reign.

The earl of Eſſex enters Cornwal. June 26. Ruſhworth. Vol. V. p. 690, 691. Clarendon, Vol. II. 395.

When Eſſex heard of the King's approach, he called a council of war, to debate what was to be done in this emergency. His own opinion was, to return, and prevent Charles's penetrating farther into the country, and to give him battle if a favorable opportunity offered. He repreſented that, in Devonſhire or Somerſetſhire, as he ſhould not be ſtraitened in room or proviſions, he might either fight, or avoid it, as he ſhould judge requiſite. But lord Roberts of Truro (1), field-marſhal in this expedition, whoſe eſtate lay all in Cornwal, poſitively affirmed, that ſo ſoon as the army ſhould enter that county, the people would all declare for the parliament: that then it would be impoſſible for his Majeſty to come there, and the army might eaſily ſubſiſt, and be re-inforced with a great number of troops. On this aſſurance, which afterwards proved very falſe, lord Roberts, rather by a ſort of violence, than the ſtrength of his reaſonings, got it determined, that the army ſhould march into Cornwal.

CHARLES I AN' 1644.

Charles follows him. p. 396. Whitelock. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 691.

Purſuant to this reſolution, Eſſex entered that county the twenty-ſixth of July, after forcing the paſſage at Newbridge, which was bravely defended *. The ſame day, Charles came to Exeter (2), and, after a general muſter of his army, followed the earl, who found not in Cornwal what lord Roberts had made him expect. He notwithſtanding advanced to Lanceſton, and thence to Bodmin, where he wrote to the parliament, that he did not doubt, the King's deſign was to ſtraiten him for proviſions, and therefore earneſtly deſired, forces might be ſent into the Weſt, to lie upon the King's rear, and hinder him from executing his project. But as ſir William Waller was not ready to march, being then at London ſolliciting ſupplies for his army, all could be done was, to detach colonel Middleton, with two thouſand five hundred horſe and dragons (3), with orders to march Weſtwards.

Charles, perceiving Eſſex intangled in a country where he wanted proviſions for his army's ſubſiſtance, judged this a fair opportunity to gain him. He therefore wrote him a letter, perſuading him to free himſelf from his preſent ſtraits, by reſtoring peace to the kingdom, i. e. by declaring for ſuch a peace as his Majeſty required. Eſſex not returning any anſwer to this letter, Prince Maurice, and the earl of Forth, lately created earl of Brentford, the King's general, wrote to him two days after; and next day he received another epiſtle on the ſame ſubject, ſigned by many officers of the royal army. Finally he gave the earl of Brentford to underſtand, by a ſhort note, that he had no commiſſion to treat.

About this time, lord Wilmot, lieutenant-general of the King's cavalry, was arreſted by his Majeſty's order; he having preſumed to adverti ſe Eſſex, that if he would enter into treaty, the officers of the King's army were ſo deſirous of peace, they would conſtrain his Majeſty to conclude it upon reaſonable terms. Wilmot's diſgrace bred ſome murmurs among the horſe-officers, by whom he was very much beloved: nay, they addreſſed Charles with a petition, requiring him to let them know of what crime that nobleman was accuſed. King Charles, at ſuch a juncture, was very ready to give them this ſatisfaction. Nevertheleſs, lord Wilmot was deprived of his poſt, which was given to lord Goring, after which, he had leave to retire beyond-

ſea (1). It was generally believed in the army, that Wilmot's diſgrace was owing to ſome court-intrigue, and the King's private hatred of him, on account of the part he had acted againſt the earl of Strafford.

Eſſex too late perceived the vanity of lord Roberts's promiſes. So far were thoſe of Cornwal from riſing in his favor, that they contrariwiſe ran in crouds to join the royal army. The earl could have proviſions only by ſea, and in ſmall quantities, by means of a river which afforded him a communication with Plymouth (2). At length, ſir Richard Greenvil having brought Charles a ſupply of troops, it was, in a council of war, reſolved to make uſe of the ſuperiority of numbers, not to compel Eſſex to fight, but intirely to cut off his relief. This was happily effected, by means of a fort, run up on the ſide of that river whereby the enemies received their proviſions. Thus Eſſex, being reduced to the laſt extremity, after having held his ſtation near a month, reſolved to abandon his army, to avoid falling into the King's hands. But before he put in execution that deſign, he ordered ſir William Balfour to indeavor ſaving the cavalry, which he performed very fortunately, in a dark miſty night, by paſſing unobſerved thro' Charles's quarters (3). As ſoon as Eſſex knew his cavalry to be out of danger, he ſent to the King and demanded a parley; but before the anſwer was returned, he took ſhip with ſome officers and retired to Plymouth, leaving major-general Skippon to procure the beſt terms he could for his infantry.

He ſaves his cavalry and retires to Plymouth. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 404. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 699.

His Majeſty granting the parley deſired by the earl of Eſſex before his departure, a conference was held between ſome officers of both armies, where the following articles were agreed on (4).

p. 705.

I. That, on the morrow, being the ſecond of September, all the officers and ſoldiers under command of the earl of Eſſex, ſhall deliver up all their cannons and train of artillery, with all carriages, neceſſaries and materials thereunto belonging; and likewiſe all arms offenſive and defenſive, with all ammunition whatſoever, except only the ſwords and piſtols of all officers above the degree of corporals.

II. That, immediately after, all officers and ſoldiers ſhall march out of their quarters, to Leſtwithiel, with their colors, trumpets and drums; and that all officers above the degree of ſerjeants, ſhall take with them ſuch horſes and ſervants as properly belong to them, with all their bag and baggage, and waggons with their teems.

III. That they ſhall have a ſafe convoy of one hundred horſe, from their quarters, to Leſtwithiel, and thence in their march to Pool and Wareham.

IV. That in caſe they ſhall march from Pool to any other place by land, they ſhall not bear arms more than is allowed in the agreement, until they come to Southampton or Portſmouth.

V. That, all the ſick and wounded ſhould be left at Foy, 'till they can be conveniently tranſported to Plymouth.

VI. That, all the officers and ſoldiers ſhall be permited to receive ſuch money, proviſions, and other accomodations, as they ſhould be able to procure from Plymouth; to which end, they ſhall have a paſs for any twelve perſons, whom they ſhall ſend for the ſame.

Charles I An' 1644.

VII. That, there ſhall be no inviting of any ſoldiers, but that ſuch as will voluntarily come to his Majeſty's ſervice, ſhall not be hindered.

By this treaty, Charles properly gained only artillery, arms and ammunition. But tho' his having reduced this army to ſuch a condition was a good article enough, it would have been of abundantly greater importance to him, had he made the officers and ſoldiers priſoners of war: for the parliament wanted neither artillery, arms, nor ammunition to repair their army, which was in effect able, within five or ſix weeks, to give his Majeſty battle. It is to be preſumed, this Prince had good reaſon to be ſatisfied with this ſlight advantage.

Eſſex well received at London. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 405.

Tho' the earl of Eſſex might have been juſtly reprimanded for the two errors he had been guilty of (in obſtinately purſuing his march to the Weſt, contrary to the order of both houſes, and in prepoſterouſly ſuffering himſelf to be decoyed into Cornwal) he was not inſulted for his misfortunes, but at his return was very courteouſly received. It was then no proper time to examine his conduct. The point was to recruit and arm the ruined army, as well as that of Waller; and accordingly both houſes applied themſelves to it with all poſſible diligence. They likewiſe ordered colonel Middleton to repair ſpeedily to Eſſex's army, and the earl of Manchester to march the ſame way with his forces.

Charles's meſſage to both houſes, with offers of peace.

King Charles, after having gained this advantage which to him appeared ſo very conſiderable, fancied that the terrified parliament would deſire nothing more than coming to ſome agreement. He plainly perceived, that ſuch a peace as he deſired was impracticable, while the parliament was proſperous. But he flattered himſelf with the hopes that, after ſo ſignal a misfortune, his adverſaries would joyfully accept his offers, and inſiſt no longer on terms he was fully reſolved not to grant. In this belief, he from Taviſtock diſpatched to both houſes a freſh meſſage, with offers of peace, and annexed to it a duplicate of his former one from Eveſham. This meſſage was ſo worded, that he ſeemed, thro' pure moderation, to offer, after his victory, to be content with having, by a peace, what he was in condition to obtain by force of arms. But if notice be taken of what I advanced above, to explain what is to be underſtood by the peace offered by this Prince, it will be found that, thro' exceſs of modeſty, moderation and affection for his people, he would be ſatisfied to obtain by a treaty what hitherto he had not been able to procure by arms: for that was the real meaning of his offer, tho' diſguiſed under the ſpecious name of peace. The parliament muſt have underſtood it in that ſenſe, ſince it was not regarded. Undoubtedly, the King himſelf did not believe he could deceive both houſes by the bare name of peace, after having ſo often experienced how much they were upon their guard in that reſpect. But theſe frequent offers of peace were properly deſigned to make impreſſion upon the people, who ſaw not into their real meaning.

So that our author miſtakes, in ſaying, he had Wilmot's poſt given him: for his Majeſty, the day after his arreſting him, told the officers of horſe, he had juſtly reſtrained Wilmot for the preſent, but had not taken away from him his command in the army. However Wilmot, when he ſaw his mortal enemy, Goring, put in the command over him, thought himſelf incapable of reparation, or full vindication, ſo deſired leave to retire into France, and had a paſs ſent him for that purpoſe. before Plymouth (1), in hopes that, after his late victory, the gates would be opened to him. But having ſummoned it in vain, and even given ſome aſſaults, he was forced to retire, the ſeaſon not admiting his undertaking ſo important a ſiege, which would, probably have held him ſeveral months imployed. Beſide, his deſign was to march towards London, where he ſuppoſed all were in the utmoſt conſternation. Mean while, general Goring, with a detachment of the army, poſſeſſed himſelf of Barnſtaple.

Arrival of the Elector Palatine at London. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 713.

I have had frequent occaſion to touch on the Elector Palatine's affairs, and to obſerve how much King James and his ſucceſſor neglected the intereſts, one of the King his ſon-in-law, and the other of the Elector his nephew. This Elector's whole dominions being in the hands of his enemies, he fled for refuge to the King his uncle, who gave him a penſion for his ſubſiſtence. Poſſibly, this penſion was ill paid ſince King Charles was ingaged in war with Scotland, and ſtill worſe, ſince the begining of this parliament. So the Elector, having attended his royal uncle 'till he retreated into the North, and ſeeing the war ready to commence, left him at York abruptly. He retired into Holland, and continued there 'till Auguſt 1644, when he ſuddenly paſſed over to reſide at London, under protection of the parliament. King Charles hearing this, wrote to him, to know the reaſon of ſo extraordinary a procedure. It does not appear what anſwer the Elector returned; but, ſeemingly, being at a loſs how to ſubſiſt, and conſidering the King his uncle was not able to entertain him, he believed he ſhould find more aſſiſtance in the parliament, which had ever expreſſed much affection and zeal for his houſe. He was not deceived in his expectations: for the parliament granted him a very honorable penſion, which was more regularly paid than the former one from his Majeſty (2). He afterwards deſired and obtained leave to hear the debates in the aſſembly of divines. Probably, as he did not care to be concerned in military affairs, he ſought to imploy his time in converſing with the learned, and improving himſelf in matters of religion.

His Majeſty determines on marching to London.

Charles was ſo fixedly poſſeſſed with the belief, that his victory could not but make a ſtrong impreſſion upon his peoples minds, that he reſolved on marching directly to London. He queſtioned not but his army would conſiderably increaſe by the way, and people abandon the two houſes when they ſhould ſee him advancing towards the metropolis. True, ſuch turns had been formerly ſeen in England, but very ſeldom, or never, in favor of Princes againſt whom the Engliſh believed they had cauſe of complaint. However, tho' Charles had given but too much occaſion to complain of his government, yet was he perſuaded he was beloved by the people, and imputed whatever they did againſt him to the artifices, calumnies, promiſes, threats and violences which were uſed to miſlead or compel them. In this belief, he imagined the people wanted only opportunity to free themſelves from the parliament's yoke, and that the preſent one, being very favorable, was not to be neglected. He therefore, the thirtieth of September, iſſued a proclamation, dated at Char, wherein he ſet forth, with what earneſtneſs and ſincerity he had always deſired and offered peace, which had been conſtantly rejected by both houſes: after which he ſaid; "That he had therefore re- "ſolved, with his army, to draw preſently to- "wards London, and his Southern and Eaſtern "counties, not looking upon theſe parts as ene- "mies to him, but as his poor ſubjects, op- "preſſed by power ('of which he was aſſured the "greater part remained loyal to him') and ſo "deſerving his protection; hoping that, at a "nearer diſtance of place, there might be begot "ſo right an underſtanding between him and "his people, that at length he might obtain a "treaty for peace, and a full and free conven- "tion in parliament, and therein make an end "of theſe unhappy differences, by a good accom- "modation; whereby his people might be ſetled "in the poſſeſſion of their rights and liberties. "And therefore he required his ſubjects, within "his own quarters, thro' or near which he ſhould "paſs, forthwith to prepare themſelves with the "beſt arms they could get, to be ready to join "him. He authoriſed likewiſe, as well the trained- "bands of London, as his ſubjects of the Eaſtern "and Southern counties, to chuſe their own com- "manders among thoſe gentlemen and citizens, "who were of approved loyalty, and lovers "of peace, requiring them at his approach to put "themſelves in arms, and aſſiſt in this expedi- "diton, and commanding them to ſeize ſuch "places of ſtrength as the rebels were poſſeſſed "of, and to apprehend the perſons of all ſuch "as ſhould hinder ſetling the peace of the king- "dom."

CHARLES I An' 1644.

All the effect this proclamation produced was, p. 717. that the inhabitants of Somerſetſhite, where the King then was, preſented him a petition, humbly beſeeching his Majeſty, "That they might have "liberty to wait upon him in perſon, and, at a "nearer diſtance of place, become petitioners to "both houſes, to imbrace his Majeſty's offers "of peace; and in caſe of refuſal, they promiſed "to ſpend their lives and fortunes in aſſiſting "him to compaſs, by the ſword, what by "fair means, could not be effected." But this was only a promiſed aid, and as yet too remote for Charles to make any uſe of it in the preſent expedition.

He meets with obſtructions in his march. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 416, &c.

Had every thing happened as this Monarch had imagined; had the people flocked to his army; had he been chearfully ſupplied with all neceſſaries, very probably, he might have reached London before the parliament-forces could have been joined to form a new army. But his troops, inſtead of increaſing in their march, as he expected, daily diminiſhed by fatigues, by want of money, ſhoes, &c. and ſickneſs, which diſabled many of his followers from keeping pace with the army (3). He was obliged to make frequent halts in ſeveral towns, to wait for money and other neceſſaries, which he perceived would not be ſupplied when he ſhould be removed. His cavalry being diſcontented, as well at lord Wilmot's diſgrace, as at their having received no pay this campain, he

Upon his landing at Graveſend, a commitee of the commons attended him, and in May, 1645, the commons ordered him an allowance of 8000 l. per ann, 2000 l. whereof out of the King's revenue, and the reſt out of the eſtates of lord Cottington, and ſir Nicholas Criſpe. was forced to ſtay 'till the Eaſtern counties ſhould furniſh wherewithal to ſatisfy them, otherwiſe he durſt not advance. Theſe delays were the reaſon why he arrived not at Saliſbury 'till the fifteenth of October, ſix weeks after the advantage gained in Cornwal. Then it was that he altered his reſolution; and, inſtead of marching to London, contented himſelf with returning to his old quarters in and about Oxford: nay, this project could not be executed without difficulty, conſidering the meaſures his opponents had taken.

The parliament forms a great army. p. 719.

During King Charles's march, the parliament was not idle. They had provied arms and clothes for the earl of Eſſex's infantry, and detached, in order to join him, the city-brigade, conſiſting of five thouſand men (1), beſide the neceſſary recruits. Sir William Waller was again in the field, his army being recruited and re-inforced, and now at Andover ready to march. Eſſex's cavalry, who fortunately eſcaped in Cornwal, were alſo come up, as well as thoſe ſent into the Weſt under colonel Middleton's conduct. Thus, the earl of Eſſex ſaw himſelf in condition to march, the ſeventeenth of October, in order to join ſir William Waller and the earl of Mancheſter, who was within diſtance. His Majeſty, having notice that Waller deſigned for Reading, advanced with all poſſible diligence towards Andover, to give him battle before he had joined the earl of Eſſex: nay, he fell on his rear and killed twenty or thirty of his men. But this could not hinder the junction of the three armies, which, on the twenty-firſt of October, was effected.

Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 418, 419, 420.

While his Majeſty's enemies lay ſo near him, he, moſt unadviſedly, as it ſeems, detached from his army the earl of Northampton, with three regiments of horſe, to relieve Banbury-caſtle, which had been beſieged ſince July the nineteenth, and was now reduced to extremity. The earl ſucceeded in his expedition; but his Majeſty was like to pay dear for it, ſince, a few days after, he was forced to ingage, deprived of the aid of theſe three regiments. His deſign, as I obſerved, was only retiring to Oxford, there being no farther reaſon could induce him to purſue his march towards London. But he would firſt beſiege Dennington-caſtle, and therefore advanced to Newbury, diſtant but a mile from that caſtle, while the parliament army was at Reading. Next day, that army marched towards Newbury, where Charles fortified himſelf as beſt he could, and ſtationed his infantry in the intrenchments, while his cavalry were poſted in two adjoining open fields, and for ſome days there were frequent ſkirmiſhes between the two armies. At laſt, on the twenty-ſeventh of October, the parliament generals, having divided their forces into two bodies (2), attacked the King's intrenchments at two different quarters. The fight, which began about three or four in the afternoon, held 'till night, and was extremely ſharp, each ſide alternately repulſing its opponent. This is all can be gathered with any certainty from the accounts of this battle, except that, when night approached, the aſſailants forced part of the intrenchment, and took ſome pieces of ordnance: but night prevented their improving this advantage, and put a ſtop to this fierce conflict (3).

CHARLES I An' 1644.

Mean while Charles, fearing the enemy would next morning penetrate into his lines, withdrew that night, and marched to Wallingford, leaving his heavy cannon and baggage in Dennington-caſtle. The earl of Eſſex was not in the battle. He had quited the army ſome days before; whether on account of ſome ſudden indiſpoſition, or perhaps thro' diſcontent, not being able to agree either with the earl of Mancheſter, or ſir William Waller.

Charles retires in the night. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 722. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 423.

One might preſume that the parliament generals, who deemed themſelves victorious, ſhould have attacked Charles in his retreat, whereof they could not be ignorant, it being then full-moon. They however ſuffered him to march without purſuing him (4); ſo that he ſafely arrived at Oxford: nor was this their greateſt error. That Prince having left his cannon, ammunition, and baggage in Dennington-caſtle, they could have done nothing more advantageous than imploying their whole ſtrength to reduce that place. But they contented themſelves with ſummoning the governor (5); and, on his refuſal to capitulate, they remained quiet at Newbury without making the leaſt attempt. This negligence muſt have been owing to the diſſenſion between them, one blaming the other for being the cauſe that, with ſo ſuperior a force, the King's army was not intirely routed. This diſſenſion grew ſo high, that whatever was propoſed by the one, was ſure to be oppoſed by the other. We ſhall hereafter ſee ſtill worſe effects of their diſcord, and the revolutions it occaſioned.

Diſſenſions between the parliament generals. p. 424. Whitelock. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 729.

Mean while his Majeſty, being informed of the diſcord between the parliament generals, and of their leaving Dennington-caſtle unattacked, very wiſely improved ſo favourable a juncture. Some days after his arrival at Oxford, he was joined by Prince Rupert, who brought him ſome cavalry. He drew a body of foot from the gariſon of Oxford, and other neighboring towns, and the earl of Northampton rejoined him with his brigade of horſe. By means of theſe ſupplies, he formed an army of ſix thouſand foot, and five thouſand horſe, with which he marched back towards Newbury, the ſecond of November. After the battle, the parliament-army had moved towards Oxford, but was returned to Newbury, on pretenſe that the ways were unpaſſable; but the main reaſon was, the generals could not agree, there being no commander in chief. They received ſome intelligence of his Majeſty's march; but would not believe it 'till they heard of his being within ſix miles of Dennington. Thereupon they reſolved to draw up, on the morrow, between Dennington and Charles's army. To that end, orders were given for all their cavalry to rendezvous early next morning, it not being poſſible to march that day by reaſon their quarters were too ſeparate and remote. But that very night, the King purſued his march to Dennington, and, drawing up his army between the caſtle and Newbury, waited in that poſture to obſerve what the enemy would attempt. Tho' the parliament army was likewiſe preſently after drawn up, the generals, having viewed the poſture and ſtrength of his Majeſty's, and held a council of war, judged it unſafe to ingage: ſo, after ſome ſkirmiſhes, the King having drawn out what he left at Dennington, marched back to Oxford, where he arrived the twenty-firſt of November. In his way thither, he ſent a detachment of his army to relieve the marquis of Wincheſter, who had been long beſieged in his own caſtle of Baſing: but this detachment found the ſiege already raiſed. Thus ended the campain of 1644, which proved not ſo fatal to King Charles as he had reaſon to fear, tho' however he loſt York and all the North.

It is time now to ſpeak of ſome other occurrences of the year 1644, which had no immediate relation to the war, but of which the knowledge is no leſs uſeful and neceſſary than that of conflicts and battles, tho' they have no natural connection together, nor depend on each other.

Ordinance to forbear one meal per week. p. 748.

March twenty-ſixth, 1644, the parliament paſſed an ordinance, injoining every family * to forbear one meal per week, and contribute the value thereof for the public occaſions. This was properly laying a tax upon every family: for otherwiſe, very likely, the parliament did not much care whether this weekly meal was forborne or not, provided each perſon paid the ſum impoſed.

p. 749. April the thirteenth, a certain Oxford ſpy was executed in Palace-yard, Weſtminſter.

p. 750. The fifteenth ditto, it was voted by the commons, that the commitee of both kingdoms ſhould prepare propoſitions for peace, to be preſented to his Majeſty: not that they deſired then to enter into a freſh treaty with him; for, ſince the conferences at Oxford were broken off, nothing had paſſed to induce them to alter their plan. But herein they had a double view; firſt to let the public ſee, they pretended not abſolutely to reject peace, as they were charged by the King: ſecondly, they had thereby a pretenſe ready to propoſe a peace, in caſe they were forced to it by the misfortues of war during the campain. What confirms this to have been their chief aim, is, that theſe propoſitions, which after all were the ſame in ſubſtance with thoſe debated at Oxford, were not ſent up to their lordſhips 'till the nineteenth of Auguſt, at that very inſtant when the earl of Eſſex was decoyed into Cornwal, and not to his Majeſty 'till the twentieth of November.

Parliament reſolves kept more private.

To the year 1644 the war affairs were ſo publicly debated in parliament, that Charles was acquainted with the reſolutions there taken before they began to be put in execution. But, this year, the managers thought fit to give the commitee of both kingdoms, who were charged with thoſe matters, more power than before, that they might give their orders, and cauſe them to be executed, without being obliged to communicate their reſolutions to both houſes. I know not whether this was by expreſs vote, or by mere uſurpation, the commitee knowing they ſhould at leaſt be avowed by the leading members, in caſe it was attempted to call them to account. A conſiderable advantage indeed was hereby gained, in that the reſolutions became more private, and the King had not ſo good information; but, on the other hand, the commitee had by it a power which might be of very dangerous conſequence: and therefore ſeveral members complained, that the moſt important affairs were not communicated, but that the direction and management was reſerved, by the commitee, to themſelves alone. The time for which they had been appointed being about to expire, the commons paſſed an ordinance, for the continuance of the commitee three months longer, and ſent it up to the peers: but their lordſhips, inſtead of paſſing this ordinance as ſent by the commons, added a clauſe to increaſe the number of this commitee, with five lords and ten commoners. * Indiſputably, King Charles's private friends uſed their indeavors to increaſe the number of the commitee, in hope of being able to gain ſome one to inform them of what ſhould be there tranſacted. But the commons, foreſeeing the conſequence of their addition, refuſed their conſent to it, and deſired the peers, that they would paſs the ordinance without any amendment. Their lordſhips declining to do it for ſome time, the commons found means to get the lord-mayor and common-council of London to petition them, among other matters, that the commitee of both kingdoms might be continued as it was (1). Then the lords, perceiving that, ſince London interpoſed, their reſiſtance would be fruitleſs, paſſed the ordinance four days after. The declarations of the city of London were a curb frequently uſed by the commons to ſtop the career of Charles's partiſans, when, by their cabals, they were laboring to diſturb their deliberations, or to ſow diſcord between the two houſes. Beſide it would have been dangerous, as well as unjuſt, to diſoblige that great city, by whom the charges of the war were chiefly borne, and experience had ſhewn, that the city had infallible expedients to ſupport their friends in parliament. The hiſtorians of the two parties are in different ſentiments on this ſubject. The royaliſts pretend, that the generality of Londoners were for his Majeſty, and would gadly have accepted the peace he was pleaſed to offer them, but were over-awed by their magiſtrates, of whom a great majority were devoted to the parliament. Contrariwiſe, the parliamentarians affirm, that the number of Londoners who were for the King came far ſhort of that of his enemies, and that the commotions ſometimes in the city, whether to demand peace, or to diſturb the parliament's debates, were no other than the effect of cabals among ſome private perſons, who ſecretly adhered to the King, and indeavored to ſow diſſenſion between the parliament and city: and that all this manifeſtly appears in the ill ſucceſs of their reiterated attempts.

May 20.

There was, in the above-mentioned London petition, another article of no leſs importance. Very many members of both houſes, as I obſerved, had deſerted the parliament, before and after the war commenced. Some had taken this courſe thro' affection to the King, and in order to ſerve him in his army; others by his expreſs command; ſeveral thro' fear of puniſhment, for attempting to force the parliament to a peace; and perhaps, ſome to avoid being expoſed to the outrages of the London populace. By the retreat of theſe members, that faction which oppoſed his Majeſty was become ſo ſuperior in both houſes, that no man durſt any longer contradict whatever they thought proper to move. Indeed, it would have been very fruitleſs for the King's new friends in the parliament to attempt ſupporting his intereſt.

CHARLES I An' 1644.

Charles had therefore perceived, that his policy in diminiſhing the number of members in both houſes, inſtead of being advantageous, had contrariwiſe proved very prejudicial to him; for, by that means, the reſolutions againſt him paſſed in parliament with abundant leſs difficulty. His enemies were now freed from reſtraint, and met with no farther oppoſition. The commons, perceiving that, from time to time, ſome of theſe members returned to London, thought not proper to admit them into the houſe, purſuant to a vote paſſed long before on that ſubject. They were apprehenſive, if ſuch members were admited, the King might in time ſend them ſo great a number, as would ſuffice to obſtruct their deliberations. Mean while, to juſtify their refuſal to admit them, they ſo managed that, one article of the petition, preſented them by the common-council of London, was; "That none "of the members who had deſerted the parliament ſhould be received, without ſatisfaction "firſt given to both houſes for their future fidelity." In purſuance of this deſire, it was declared ſoon after, by an ordinance; "That ſuch "peers as had deſerted, or ſhould deſert the parliament, ſhould not be re-admited without the "conſent of both houſes; and that whatſoever "member of the houſe of commons had ſo offended, "or ſhould ſo offend hereafter, and adhere to thoſe "who were levying war againſt the parliament, "were and ſhould be abſolutely diſabled from "ſiting in the houſe of commons." By this means, ſuch as might deſign returning to the parliament, for the King's ſervice, had ſufficient warning, that their artifice would be without effect.

The earl of Leiceſter returns to London. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 715.

The earl of Leiceſter, who about this time left Oxford, and returned to London, was not of the number of thoſe who forſook the King to do him ſervice. He had too much reaſon to be diſſatisfied with that Prince, for amuſing him two years ſucceſſively, under color of ſending him into Ireland, and for finally nominating the marquis of Ormond lord-lieutenant. This earl was however ordered into cuſtody on his arrival at London; but, in all appearance, it was only to ſhew, that the new ordinance was intended to be rigorouſly executed.

Embaſſy from the ſtates-general. p. 716.

In January 1643-4, the ſtates-general of the United Provinces ſent embaſſadors into England, to offer their mediation, whereof the two houſes made no great account, knowing what credit the Prince of Orange, the King's ſon-in-law, had in theſe provinces: beſide, the embaſſadors, who were all ſuppoſed to be the Prince of Orange's creatures, refuſed to acknowledge the two houſes at Weſtminſter for the parliament of England. At length, theſe embaſſadors, after ſeveral journies to Oxford, and attempts to perſuade the parliament to accept their mediation without the previous acknowledment required, fully owned the two houſes for the parliament of England, and preſented a memorial to offer their mediation. It muſt be obſerved, this was done the day after hearing of Prince Rupert's defeat at Marſton-moor. As they had long delayed this acknowledgment, both houſes in their turn left them ſome time without any anſwer, being doubtleſs willing to intimate to them, that they looked not on this mediation as ſufficiently impartial. Wherefore, the tenth of December, they demanded a public audience, which was granted, and whereat they again offered their maſters mediation. Both houſes replied, that they readily accepted the ſtates mediation: but had already ſent propoſitions to the King for a treaty of peace, of which they were to wait the ſucceſs: that moreover, the two kingdoms of England and Scotland being united together by a ſolemn covenant, they could do nothing without the Scots concurrence, which would require ſome time. Thus they evaded thoſe offers of the ſtates-general, not believing ſuch a mediation could be for their advantage.

Trial of lord Macguire, and Mac-Mahone. p. 729, 741. State Try.

Since the famous William Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, had been impriſoned near the cloſe of 1640, I have had but little occaſion to ſpeak of him. It is time now to relate his tragical cataſtrophe. He was by the commons accuſed of high-treaſon, December the eighteenth, 1640, and thereupon commited to the cuſtody of the black-rod. The twenty-ſixth of February following, the articles of impeachment were brought in againſt him, and then he was ſent to the Tower. There he remained 'till October the twenty-third, 1643, when the commons having added ten freſh articles to the impeachment, he was by the lords ordered to anſwer, the thirtieth ditto. It would be too tedious to ſpecify all the petitions he preſented, and all the expedients wherewith his counſel furniſhed him, in order to get his ſentence defered. It ſuffices to ſay, that he gained time 'till the eleventh of November, 1644, on which day he ſpake ſeveral hours together in his own defenſe. But, whether the commons were apprehenſive their proofs were not ſufficient for his condemnation, or the delays conceded him by the peers gave them cauſe to think they were inclined to ſave his life, they uſed the ſame method as in the earl of Strafford's caſe, I mean a bill of attainder, which paſſed their houſe that very day the prelate made his defenſe before their lordſhips, with but one diſſenting vote. The bill being ſent up to the lords, they acquainted the commons, that, indeed they found the archbiſhop guilty of the charge, as to matters of fact, but deſired ſome farther ſatisfaction in point of law, whether the matters amounted to treaſon. Hereupon the commons imparted to them the reaſons, whereby they pretended to prove him guilty of that crime. January the fourth, their lordſhips paſſed the bill of attainder, whereby it was ordained, he ſhould ſuffer death as in caſes of high-treaſon; and, on the ſixth, both houſes ordered, he ſhould be executed the tenth. On the ſeventh, the lords, at a conference, informed the commons of a pardon to the archbiſhop from his Majeſty, dated the twelfth of April, 1643; but it was over-ruled and rejected. The ſame day the archbiſhop, ſeeing there was no remedy, petitioned the lords, that the manner of his execution might be changed to beheading: he likewiſe requeſted, that ſome of his chaplains might be permited to be with him before, and at his death. Their lordſhips very readily granted his two requeſts, but the commons refuſed both, and ſent him two miniſters whom he did not aſk for, with one of thoſe he deſired.

desired. Next day, he presented a second petition to be beheaded, seting forth, that he was a divine, bishop, privy-counsellor, and peer; whereupon the commons were at length prevailed with. When on the scaffold, he made a pretty long speech; wherein he, among other matters, insinuated, that "he suffered for not forsaking the temple of God, "to follow the bleatings of Jereboam's calves;" alluding to the schism of the Presbyterians. He said, —— "He had ransacked every corner of his "heart, and thanked God, he had not found any "sins there deserving death, by the known laws "of the land. The King had been traduced by "some for laboring to bring in Popery; but, upon "his conscience, he knew him to be as free from such "a charge as any man living, and held him to be "as sound a Protestant, according to the religion "established by law, as any person in the kingdom. "He protested, he never indeavored the subver-"sion of the laws of the realm, nor ever any "change of the Protestant religion into Popish "superstition. He had never been an enemy to "parliaments, but did indeed dislike the mis-"government of one or two ——." After he had prayed, the executioner did his office at one blow. His friends were suffered to take his body and bury it in Alhallows-Barking church. Such was the end of this famous prelate, who, let his favorers say what they please, was one of the chief authors of the troubles which afflicted England: first, by supporting with all his power the arbitrary principles which the court, for several years labored, to establish: secondly, by a too rigid observance of trifles in the divine service, and by forcing all people to a conformity with his innovations. All can be said in his favor is, that he believed in his own conscience this rigidness was necessary.

The liturgy abolished. Jan. 4. 1644-5. Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 785.

The same day their lordships passed the bill of attainder against Laud, they also passed an ordinance, abolishing the book of Common-prayer, and establishing the Directory, which had been framed by the assembly of divines. Hereby the church of England was by public authority rendered completely Presbyterian, to the great satisfaction of the Scots, and many of the principal members of both houses. This was but a bad preparative for the peace which was now negociating, and whereof I have hitherto defered making mention, not to interrupt my narrative.

The Treaty at Uxbridge. p. 787. Dugdale's View. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 442, &c.

King Charles, as has been often seen, sent message upon message to the two houses with overtures of peace; and doubtless he would have granted it very willingly, had they been as ready to receive it in his sense: but they perfectly knew what they were to understand by the word peace. Beside, at the very time his Majesty offered to treat with both houses, he carefully avoided using any term which might intimate his acknowledging them to be a parliament. It was necessary therefore, if they desired to treat with him, either that he should expresly own them as such, or that they should treat as private persons without authority. But, supposing they could have resolved to do so, what would such a treaty have signified? This was the pretense used by both houses, during the campain of 1644, not to answer the King's invitations. Mean while, as his Majesty talked loudly of his often repeated offers, to persuade people of his sincere desire of peace, and of the parliament's refusal, both houses resolved to oblige him to explain more clearly what he understood by peace, that the people might examine whether he offered sufficient security: for, as I observed, this was the sole point in dispute. The treaty at Oxford, where two propositions only were debated, not having fully cleared this matter, the two houses thought it would be for their advantage to induce Charles, by a second treaty, to declare positively, that he would give no other security than his bare word. They hoped this would suffice to efface whatever impressions his re-iterated offers might have made on peoples minds.

Motives of the two houses in proposing a peace.

Charles I An' 1644.

The parliament send propositions to his Majesty. Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 787. Whitelock, p. 112.

During the campain, it was no proper season for such a negociation, by reason of the variety of accidents war produced. It was not 'till November the twentieth, two days after King Charles's return from Oxford, that the two houses tendered him the propositions which had been prepared last summer. They had sent to desire a safe-conduct for their commissioners, which his Majesty had granted, but only as to private persons, without a sillable to denote his considering them as the parliament's commissioners. Tho' the two houses were far from being pleased with such a pass, they however accepted it, and their commissioners repaired to Oxford, where Charles arrived a day before. At their first audience, that Prince asked them, whether they had power to treat? They answered, no; their commission was only to receive his Majesty's answer in writing. Charles replied, Then a letter-carrier might have done as much as you. Seemingly, he had expected that the two houses would treat with him, without his owning them for the parliament of England, wherein he was greatly deceived. He heard the propositions read with great attention and patience, and then receiving them from their hands, told them, he would give them his answer.

Private conferences between Charles and two of the parliament's commissioners. p. 113. Rushworth, Vol. V. p. 788.

The earl of Lindsey, who was with his Majesty at Oxford, having sent his compliments to Holles and Whitelock, they two, with the other commissioners consent, returned his civility by a visit. They found him indisposed, and in bed; yet he received them in presense of several noblemen then with him. Presently after, his Majesty came in, and had with them a long conference. He told them, "He knew that they were both desirous of "a peace, and wished that all the rest of the "members were of their opinion; and therefore "(said he) out of the confidence I have of you "two, I ask your advice, what answer will be "best for me to give at this time to your proposi-"tions, which may probably farther such a peace "as all good men desire?" Whitelock answered, "The best and most satisfactory answer, I hum-"bly believe, would be your Majesty's presense "with your parliament, and which I hope might "be without danger to you." The King perceiving they did not care to speak their minds before so much company, said, "I desire you two to go "into the next room, confer a little together, and "set down in writing what you apprehend may "be fit for me to return in answer to your "message." Whereupon they withdrew into another room, and, by Holles's intreaty, Whitelock wrote down what was their sense in this matter, and what might be fit for the substance of his Majesty's answer: but this he did not in his usual hand, and without subscribing any name. The paper thus written being left upon the table, the King went in, and took it up immediately. No person was present, neither did the King admit any others to hear the discourse which passed between him and them. It cannot be denied, it was very extraordinary for these commissioners to confer in private with the King, unknown to their collegues, to whom they imparted nothing of what passed between his Majesty and them. Accordingly not long after, lord Savil, lately created earl of Sussex, who was in the earl of Lindsey's chamber when Charles came in, and who returned afterwards to the parliament, accused them publicly of their having held private conferences with the King: but as he was not able to prove what he advanced, the matter went no farther. What I have been ſaying remained a ſecret, 'till Whitelock publiſhed it in his memorials, and even there we do not find the contents of the paper written by himſelf (1). It is not however impoſſible to vindicate theſe two commiſſioners, who doubtleſs, having ſome knowledge of the combination then on foot, and which I ſhall hereafter touch on, wiſhed a peace might be concluded before the project was put in execution. To all appearance, in order to promote a peace, they counſelled his Majeſty to grant the parliament certain articles, otherwiſe they foreſaw a pacification would be impracticable; but that Prince thought not fit to follow their advice.

Next day, Charles ſent his anſwer ſealed up to the commiſſioners; but they denied the receiving it, except they had alſo a copy. This his Majeſty at firſt refuſed; but finally complied. The ſubſtance of it, was only to demand a ſafe-conduct for the duke of Lenox and earl of Southampton, to carry his anſwer to the propoſitions. As this paper was not directed to any perſon, nor the parliament ſo much as named in it, the commiſſioners made ſome ſcruple about taking it. They were however prevailed with, on the ſuppoſition that both houſes would be at liberty to make of it what uſe they pleaſed. This paper being read at a conference of both houſes, the exceptions againſt the form and want of directions were warmly debated; but it was at length carried, to lay aſide all objections, and ordered, that the earl of Eſſex ſhould write to Prince Rupert as follows: "That if his Majeſty will di-

King Charles was extremely loth to do this; but the affair being debated in his council, none oppoſed it but himſelf. Nevertheleſs, he could not be prevailed on, 'till after he was furniſhed with this expedient; viz. privately to make againſt it a proteſtation; which ſhould be recorded. After that, Prince Rupert's anſwer being worded as both houſes deſired, the ſafe-conduct was ſent to Oxford.

p. 801. Dugdale's View. p. 748.

The two peers ſent from Charles being come to London, delivered his Majeſty's anſwer to both houſes, dated the thirteenth of December, containing only, that whereas he found it very difficult, before a full debate, to return a poſitive anſwer to their propoſitions, if the two houſes would appoint commiſſioners, he would nominate the like number to treat with them, at any place ſhould be agreed on. As King Charles had ſaid, a common letter-carrier might have done the office of thoſe commiſſioners who brought the propoſitions, ſo it might be aſked, where was the neceſſity of imploying two chief perſons of his court and council to carry this anſwer to both houſes. But, in all appearance, this Monarch's aim was to get information, by means of theſe two lords, and his London friends, of ſome particulars wherewith he was not fully acquainted (2). Howſoever this be, not to dwell too long upon preliminaries, not abſolutely neceſſary, it ſuffices to ſay, that they agreed on the following articles: viz. That the commiſſioners of both parties ſhould meet at Uxbridge: that the conferences ſhould begin the thirtieth of January, 1644-5, and ſhould laſt twenty days: that the propoſitions, as well on the King's as the parliament's ſide, ſhould be reduced to theſe three heads, Religion, the militia, and Ireland: that religion ſhould be treated upon three days together, then the militia three days more, and after that Ireland as many; which done, the affairs of religion ſhould be reſumed for three days, then the buſineſs of the militia, and laſtly, Ireland for the ſame time. The King's commiſſioners were, the duke of Richmond, marquis of Hertford, earl of Southampton, earl of Kingſton, earl of Chicheſter, and eleven others, among whom was ſir Edward Hyde, chancellor of the exchequer, afterwards earl of Clarendon (3). Thoſe for the parliament were twelve, the chief whereof were the earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Saliſbury, and Denbigh (4): and for Scotland the principal were, the earl of Loudon, lord chancellor of Scotland, and the marquis of Argyle (5). I intend not to recite the particulars of this negociation, which was tranſacted by papers and anſwers in writing, but ſhall content myſelf with mentioning the principal matters. The King's propoſitions were in ſubſtance the ſame with thoſe he had given at Oxford, without any alteration as to the ſenſe. The parliament's were not much different from their Oxford ones, but fuller and more extenſive, and therefore I judge proper to inſert them.

" And for prevention of inconveniencies, which " may happen by the long intermiſſion of common- " councils, it is deſired, that there be an act, that " all by-laws and ordinances already made, or " hereafter to be made, by the lord-mayor, alder- " men and common-council, touching the calling, " continuing and regulating of the ſame, ſhall be " as effectual in law as if the ſame were parti- " cularly inacted by the authority of parliament: " and that the lord-mayor, aldermen and common- " council may add to, or repeal the ſaid ordinan- " ces, from time to time, as they ſhall ſee cauſe.

" That ſuch other propoſitions as ſhall be made " for the city for their farther ſafety, welfare and " government, and ſhall be approved of by both " houſes of parliament, may be granted and con- " firmed by act of parliament."

If, after peruſing theſe propoſitions, it ſhould be aſked, what authority the two houſes intended to leave their Sovereign, ſuppoſing he had accepted them, it would be difficult to anſwer. They pretended, as appears very plainly, to leave him only the empty title, and inveſt themſelves with the whole ſovereignty, and that not by artifice, but openly and publicly. Their principle was, that the Sovereign having, by breach of his oaths, and of that truſt by the people repoſed in him, rendered himſelf unworthy to hold the reins of government, the ſupreme authority was to return to its original fountain, i. e. to the people repreſented by both houſes. Accordingly, they pretended not, that the juſtice or injuſtice of the propoſitions ſhould be debated in the Uxbridge treaty; for it would have been ridiculous to aſſign but twenty days for ſuch examination; but they gave them as conditions from which they would not recede, and which the King was to imbrace or reject. For this reaſon, Charles's commiſſioners indeavored in vain to enter into a diſcuſſion of the propoſitions. All they thereby gained was, that the parliament's commiſſioners offered to demonſtrate verbally, in private conferences, that the propoſitions were very juſt. After that, pretending to have urged ſatisfactory arguments, they coldly demanded their aſſent, tho' his Majeſty's commiſſioners were far from being convinced by the reaſons alleged. This method of proceeding puzzled Charles's agents, who had prepared many arguments, objections and difficulties againſt the propoſitions, and determined to find fault with every expreſſion. For, after all, King Charles was no more deſirous of a peace than the two houſes, as will inſtantly appear, and in reality, a pacification was in a manner quite impracticable, conſidering the contrariety between the principles whereon the two parties founded their reſpective claims. To ſay all in few words, the parliament's commiſſioners departed not from a ſingle tittle of what was contained in the propoſitions.

CHARLES I AN' 1644.

Firſt, with regard to religion, the need both houſes ſtood in of Scotland, and the covenant made between the two nations, allowed them not to queſtion the juſtice of that covenant, which had been now ſworn to in both kingdoms. Accordingly, it may be affirmed, their commmiſſioners defended this article very weakly: for, to prove the neceſſity of the alterations made in religion, and in church diſcipline, the confirmation whereof they demanded, the beſt argument they alleged was the covenant itſelf. True, in ſome conferences their miniſters were ordered to ſpeak, and indeavor to ſhew that epiſcopacy was not 'Jure Divino:' but this did not prove the abſolute neceſſity of deſtroying it in England. All their reaſonings were grounded on the pretended miſchiefs it had occaſioned. But when his Majeſty's commiſſioners propoſed ſuffering epiſcopacy to remain, and reforming its abuſes, the reaſons urged in oppoſition thereto, by the parliamentarians, not to agree to it, were really childiſh.

The militia article, which included the ordering the kingdom's forces, cuſtody of places, nomination to great poſts, &c. the parliament could not depart from without owning, they were making war very wrongfully; ſince they pretended to do it, only in order to obtain ſuch ſecurities as they believed they had right to demand. If, by a treaty, they ſhould have accepted the King's word as ſufficient ſecurity, every one would have perceived they might have avoided the war, by accepting that ſecurity which the King had conſtantly offered before the rupture. It muſt however be confeſſed, this article might very juſtly have been deemed a proper ſubject for a treaty: but the parliament ſeems to have adhered ſo ſtrenouſly to this article of the militia, purely to lay invincible obſtacles to a peace: for it may be affirmed, that neither party deſired it, except greater advantages could be procured by a treaty than by arms.

As

Charles I An' 1644.

As for Ireland, the two houſes thought they had, upon this article, ſuch great advantage, that they were glad to expoſe the King to uſe lame arguments in his defenſe. Nothing is therefore more certain, than that it was not properly with deſign to make peace the two houſes ſent their commiſſioners to Uxbridge: their ſole aim was to ſhew their party, that they were determined to ſupport the changes they had made in church-government, and the eſtabliſhment of Preſbytery: to ſhew the public that King Charles, when he ſo frequently offered peace, offered only a peace moſt deſtructive and dangerous to the nation; in a word, to confirm the people in their ſuſpicions, that his Majeſty did not proceed as he ought in the affairs of Ireland.

King Charles, on his part, was no more inclined to ſeek expedients for a peace than the two houſes. If he ſent his commiſſioners to Uxbridge, it was; 1. Becauſe, having ſo often expreſſed his earneſt deſire to treat, he could not decently recede, when he was, as I may ſay, taken at his word. 2. He knew, it had been moved in parliament to purſue the war more vigorouſly than ever, and that in order to do ſo more ſucceſsfully, ſuch alterations in the army were contriving as could not but be greatly to his diſadvantage. He hoped therefore, by means of the Uxbridge treaty to retard the execution of that project, as well as the parliament's preparations. 3. He queſtioned not but the unreaſonable demands of both houſes would produce for him a good effect among the people, becauſe they would clearly perceive, that the parliament's aim was utterly to deſtroy the church of England's worſhip, practiſed ever ſince the reformation; to aſſume to themſelves the ſovereignty under color of curbing the regal power, and in ſhort, to alter the government's eſtabliſhed conſtitution both in church and ſtate. But, tho'. he had conſented to treat upon the parliament's propoſitions, he was however reſolved never to conſent to the abolition of epiſcopacy, or diminution of Kingly authority, nor to deprive himſelf of the aid he expected to receive from Ireland, by a peace with the rebels, except he was firſt ſure of peace in England.

What has been advanced, touching the ſmall inclination of both parties to peace, wants no proof with reſpect to the parliament: their propoſitions, their commiſſioners procedure, and the ſhort ſpace they aſſigned for the treaty, are clear evidences. As for the King, there are ſtill more convincing proofs. Firſt, there is not the leaſt likelihood that, in his ſituation, if he had really and ſincerely reſolved to labor for peace, he would have been willing, I will not ſay to accept, but at leaſt to liſten to propoſitions which tended to leave him only the empty title of King, and to deprive him abſolutely of the exerciſe of royalty. Had he been priſoner in the parliament's hands, harder terms could ſcarce have been propoſed to him: and in effect, when that misfortune befel him afterwards, his conquerors made very few additions to theſe terms propoſed to him at Uxbridge, when he was yet in condition to defend himſelf. Secondly, theſe intentions I aſcribe to his ſaid Majeſty, with regard to peace, are proved by ſundry papers, found in his cabinet, a few monhs after, at Naſeby-fight, and which the parliament got printed and publiſhed. I thence give here ſome extracts, becauſe they relate to my preſent theme, the Uxbridge treaty. I own, it is not impoſſible theſe papers may have been curtailed, ſophiſticated, or forged by the publiſhers: but a bare poſſibility, without other proofs, would not be ſufficient to take away all credit from theſe letters, whoſe originals the parliament boaſted were in their poſſeſſion: beſide, the impartial reader can-not there find any thing repugnant to King Charles's genius and character, or to the ſtate of this Prince's affairs.

Directions for my Uxbridge commiſſioners.

Firſt, concerning religion.

" IN this, the government of the church (as I " ſuppoſe) will be the chief queſtion, wherein " two things are to be conſidered; conſcience and " policy. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. P. 887, &c.

" For the firſt, I muſt declare unto you, that I " cannot yield to the change of the government " by biſhops, not only as I fully concur with the " general opinion of Chriſtians in all ages, as being " the beſt; but likewiſe, I hold myſelf particularly " bound, by the oath I took at my coronation, " not to alter the government of this church, from " what I found it. And as for the church's patri-" mony, I cannot ſuffer any diminution or alie-" nation of it, it being, without peradventure, " ſacrilege, and likewiſe contrary to my corona-" tion-oath. But whatſoever ſhall be offered for " rectifying of abuſes, if any have creeped in, or yet " for the eaſe of tender conſciences (ſo that it in-" damage not the foundation) I am content to hear, " and will be ready to give a gracious anſwer " thereunto.

" For the ſecond; as the King's duty is to pro-" tect the church, ſo it is the church's to aſſiſt the " King in the maintenance of his juſt authority; " wherefore my predeceſſors have been always " careful (eſpecially ſince the reformation) to keep " the dependency of the clergy intirely upon the " crown, without which it will ſcarcely ſit faſt " upon the King's head: therefore you muſt do " nothing to change or leſſen this neceſſary de-" pendency.

" Next concerning the militia. After conſcience, " this is certainly the fiteſt ſubject for a King's " quarrel: for without it the Kingly power is but " a ſhadow, and therefore upon no means to be " quited, but to be maintained according to the " ancient known laws of the land. Yet becauſe " (to attain to this ſo-much-wiſhed peace by all " good men) it is in a manner neceſſary, that " ſufficient and real ſecurity be given for the per-" formance of what ſhall be agreed upon, I permit " you, either by leaving ſtrong towns, or other " military force to the rebels poſſeſſion (until arti-" cles be performed) to give ſuch aſſurance for " performance of conditions, as you ſhall judge " neceſſary for to conclude a peace; provided al-" ways, that you take (at leaſt) as great care, by " ſufficient ſecurity, that conditions be performed " to me, and to make ſure that, the peace once " ſetled, all things ſhall return into their ancient " channels.

" As for Ireland, I confeſs they have very " ſpecious, popular arguments to preſs this point, " the gaining of no article more conducing to " their ends than this; and I have as much reaſon, " in both honor and policy, to take care how to " anſwer this, as any. All the world knows the emi-" nent, inevitable neceſſity which cauſed me to " make the Iriſh ceſſation; and there remains yet " as ſtrong reaſon for the concluding that peace; " wherefore you muſt conſent to nothing to hinder " me therein, until a clear way be ſhewed me, " how my Proteſtant ſubjects there may, pro-" bably at leaſt, defend themſelves, and that I ſhall " have have no more need to defend my conſcience " and crown from the injuries of this rebellion."

And ſo for the militia, more than what " ye have allowed by me; but even in that you " muſt obſerve, that I muſt have free nomination " of the full half; as if the total number of Scots " and all be thirty, I will name fifteen. His Majeſty's letter to the Queen.

Dear Heart, Oxford, Dec. 1644.

" —— KNOW (as a certain truth) that all, " even my party, are ſtrangely impa- " tient for peace, which obliged me much the " more, at all occaſions, to ſhew my real intentions " to peace: and likewiſe, I am put in very good " hope (ſome hold it a certainty) that if I ſhould " come to a fair treaty, the ring-leading rebels " could not hinder me from a good peace. Firſt, " becauſe their own party are moſt weary of the " war, and likewiſe for the great diſtractions " which at this time moſt aſſuredly are among " themſelves, as Preſbyterians againſt Indepen- " dents in religion, and general againſt general in " point of command. Upon theſe grounds a " treaty being moſt deſirable (not without hope of " good ſucceſs) the moſt probable means to pro- " cure it was to be uſed which might ſtand with " honor and ſafety. Among the reſt (for I will " omit all thoſe which are unqueſtionably conceal- " able) the ſound of my return to London was " thought to have ſo much force of popular rhe- " toric in it, that upon it a treaty would be had; " if refuſed, it would bring much preju- " dice to them, and be advantageous to me; " yet, leſt fooliſh or malicious people ſhould " interpret this as to proceed from fear or " folly, I have joined conditions with the propoſi- " tion (without which this ſound will ſignify no- " thing) which thou wilt find to be moſt of the " chief ingredients of an honorable and ſafe peace. " Then obſerve, if a treaty at London, with com- " miſſioners for both ſides, may be had without " it, it is not to be uſed, nor in caſe they will " treat with no body but myſelf; ſo that the con- " ditions ſave any aſperſion of diſhonor, and the " treating at London the malignity which our " factious ſpirits here may infuſe into this treaty, " upon this ſubject. This I hope will ſecure thee " from the trouble which, otherwiſe, may be " cauſed by falſe malicious rumors; and tho' I " judge myſelf ſecure in thy thoughts from ſuſ- " pecting me guilty of any baſeneſs, yet I held " this account neceſſary, to the end thou may " make others know, as well as thyſelf, this " certain truth, that no danger of death or miſery " (which I think much worſe) ſhall make me do " any thing unworthy of thy love. —— I con- " clude, by conjuring thee, as thou loveſt me, that " no appearance of peace, nor hopeful conditions " of mine, make thee neglect to haſten ſuccor for " him, who is eternally thine."

" NOW is come to paſs what I foreſaw, the " fruitleſs end (as to a preſent peace) of this " treaty; but I am ſtill confident, that I ſhall find " very good effects of it: for beſide that my com- " miſſioners have offered, to ſay no more, full " meaſured reaſon, and the rebels have ſtucken " rigidly to their demands, which I dare ſay had " been too much tho' they had taken me pri- " ſoner, ſo that aſſuredly the breach would light " foully upon them. We have likewiſe at this " time diſcovered, and ſhall make it evidently ap- " pear to the world, that the Engliſh rebels (whe- " ther baſely or ignorantly will be no very great " difference) have, as much as in them lies, tranſ- " mited the command of Ireland from the crown " of England to the Scots, which, beſide the re- " flection it will have upon theſe rebels, will clearly " ſhew, that reformation of the church is not the " chief, much leſs the only end of the Scotiſh re- " bellion.

" But it being preſumption, and no piety, ſo to " truſt to a good cauſe, as not to uſe all lawful " means to maintain it; I have thought of one " means more to furniſh thee with, for my aſſiſtance, " than hitherto thou haſt had: it is, that I give " thee power to promiſe, in my name (to whom " thou thinkeſt moſt fit) that I will take away all " the penal laws againſt the Roman-Catholics in " England, as ſoon as God ſhall make me able to " do it, ſo as by their means, or in their favors, I " may have ſo powerful aſſiſtance as may deſerve " ſo great a favor, and inable me to do it. I need not tell thee what ſecreſy this " buſineſs requires; yet this I will ſay, that this is " the greateſt point of confidence I can expreſs to " thee, for it is no thanks to me to truſt thee in " any thing elſe but in this, which is the only " thing of difference in opinion betwixt us: and " yet I know thou wilt make as good a bargain " for me, even in this, I truſting thee (tho' it con- " cerns religion) as if thou wert a Proteſtant, the " viſible good of my affairs ſo much depending " on it."——

" having ſuffered thee to be vexed by them; " Wilmot being already there, Percy on his way, " and Suſſex within few days taking his journey " to thee.———

I ſhall make no other remark on theſe letters, than that they evidently ſhew the peace, which King Charles ſeemed to deſire ſo earneſtly, was a mere empty ſound which had nothing real, but as taken in his private ſenſe of the word. I have, on the other ſide, made appear, that the two houſes were not more inclined to peace. Wherefore I hope my readers will not take amiſs my declining to enter into a long detail of the conferences at Uxbridge, where both parties ſought rather to amuſe the public, than expedients to accommodate matters. I ſhall therefore reſt ſatified with briefly relating, how far the two parties condeſcenſion reached towards concluding that peace they ſeemed to wiſh for ſo ardently.

Upon the article of religion, Charles's commiſſioners, after many diſputes, finally conſented to theſe particulars, viz.

The King's commiſſioners offers, with regard to religion. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 818. Dugdale's View. p. 780.

" 1. That freedom be left to all perſons, of " what opinion ſoever, in matters of ceremony, " and that all the penalties of the laws and cuſtoms " which injoin theſe ceremonies be ſuſpended (1).

REMARK (1) Since the penal laws were not to be aboliſhed, but only ſuſpended, it followed that the Preſbyterians could rely on that freedom no longer than it was out of the King's power to deprive them of it.

" 2. That the biſhop ſhall exerciſe no act of " juriſdiction or ordination, without the conſent " and counſel of the preſbyter, who ſhall be cho- " ſen * out of the graveſt and moſt learned mini- " ſters of that dioceſe (2).

* By the clergy of each dioceſe.

REM. (2) It was not declared what perſons were to elect the preſbyter. If it was the biſhop, this conceſſion amounted to little or nothing (a).

" 3. That the biſhop keep his conſtant reſidence " in his dioceſe, except when he ſhall be required, " by his Majeſty, to attend him on any occaſion, " and that (if he be not hindered by the infirmities " of old age or ſickneſs) he preach every Sunday " in ſome church within his dioceſe (3).

REM. (3) This was no more than the biſhop's duty, and it was not for his Majeſty's honor to let this be conſidered as condeſcenſion to promote a pacification.

" 4. That the ordination of miniſters ſhall be " always in a public and ſolemn manner, and " very ſtrict rules obſerved, concerning the ſuffi- " ciency and other qualifications of thoſe men " who ſhall be received into holy orders; and the " biſhop ſhall not receive any into holy orders, " without the apppobation and conſent of the pref- " byters, or the major part of them.

" 5. That competent maintenance and proviſion " be eſtabliſhed, by act of parliament, to ſuch vica- " rages as belong to biſhops, deans and chapters, " out of the impropriations, and according to the " value of thoſe impropriations of the ſeveral " pariſhes (4).

REM. (4) One of the Preſbyterians main points urged againſt the church of England was, that the churches were ill ſerved, becauſe the biſhops, deans and chapters, merely for cheapneſs, commited the cure of thoſe which belonged to them to inſufficient preachers. This abuſe ought certainly to have been reformed, without making it one of the pacific conditions.

CHARLES I An' 1644.

" 6. That, for the time to come, no man ſhall " be capable of two parſonages, or vicarages, with " cure of ſouls.

" 7. That, towards ſetling the public peace, one " hundred thouſand pounds ſhall be raiſed, by act " of parliament, out of the eſtates of biſhops, deans " and chapters, in ſuch manner as ſhall be thought " fit by the King and two houſes of parlia- " ment, without the alienation of any of the ſaid " lands (5).

REM. (5) By the treaty between the parliament and Scotland, biſhops, deans and chapters lands were aſſigned for payment of the Scotiſh forces. King Charles, by this conceſſion ſeemed to agree, that a hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be raiſed upon thoſe lands; but in ſuppoſing alſo the neceſſity of his ſaid Majeſty's conſent for ſo applying that ſum, the Scots could not be ſure he would agree to its being aſſigned to them.

" 8. That the juriſdiction in cauſes teſtamen- " tary, decimal, matrimonial, be ſetled in ſuch " manner as ſhall ſeem moſt convenient, by the " King and both houſes of parliament (6).

REM. (6) This conceſſion ſignified nothing, for ſince Charles did not mean to give up his negative vote in parliament, to ſay that, after the peace, this article ſhould be ſetled by the King and both houſes, was as much as to ſay, there ſhould not be therein any alteration but what the King pleaſed.

" 9. That one, or more acts of parliament be " paſſed for regulating viſitations, and againſt " immoderate fees in eccleſiaſtical courts, and the " abuſes by frivolous excommunications, and all " other abuſes in the exerciſe of eccleſiaſtical juriſ- " diction, in ſuch manner as ſhall be agreed upon by " his Majeſty, and both houſes of parliament (7).

REM. (7) This pretended conceſſion is like the former; for, after the peace ſhould be made, it would be ſtill in the King's breaſt to give, or withhold, his aſſent to the reformation of abuſes; whereas the point was to ſetle what ought to have been reformed.

When theſe conceſſions are compared with the parliament's demand, that epiſcopacy ſhould be aboliſhed, it is no wonder the parliament's commiſſioners were not ſatisfied. Accordingly, without loſing time in diſputing upon theſe articles, they rejected them as inſufficient, and offered not in the leaſt to qualify their demand.

Touching the militia, Charles's commiſſioners, after long diſputing, and alleging various arguments, to ſhew the injuſtice of depriving his Majeſty of one of his crown's moſt eſſential prerogatives, and the inconveniencies which would thence infallibly ariſe, were willing to grant:

Offers about the militia. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 827. Dugdale's View. p. 796.

" That all the forces of the kingdom, both by " ſea and land, ſhould be put into the hands of " twenty commiſſioners; ten to be named by the " King, and ten by the two houſes, and that the ſame " ſhould be done in Scotland. But they would " not conſent, the commiſſioners for Scotland " ſhould be joined with thoſe for England, ſo as " to form one commitee: or that the firſt ſhould " in any manner meddle with the affairs of Eng- " land." Upon theſe conditions, they offered, that his Majeſty ſhould be content, this commiſſion ſhould continue for three years; but ſtill the power of theſe commiſſioners was firſt to be ſetled; wherein occured many great difficulties.

(a) This remark was needleſs, being occaſioned by M. Rapin's omiting the words [by the clergy of each dioceſe] which are in the conceſſion. See Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 818.

The

CHARLES I An' 1644.

The parliament's commiſſioners would not agree, that his Majeſty ſhould nominate ten of thoſe who were to be intruſted with the militia. Their reaſon was that, the point being to give the people ſecurity, they would have none, if half the commiſſioners were of the King's nomination: nay, rather it would be a means to re-kindle the war; there being no likelihood that theſe commiſſioners, thus equally divided, would ever agree, ſince they would be of directly oppoſite principles. Moreover, proceeding on the foundation of a union between England and Scotland, and on the dangers being common to both kingdoms, they perſiſted to demand, that the commiſſioners of both kingdoms ſhould act in common. On theſe two conditions they agreed, that the commiſſion ſhould hold no more than ſeven years, after having long contended for a time limited. Thus the negociation, upon this, ſucceeded no better than upon the preceding article.

About Ireland. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 843.

As to Ireland, the commiſſioners came not to any concluſion. The parliamentarians would have the ceſſation to be void, and that thenceforwards, neither peace nor truce ſhould be made without the conſent of both houſes. The royaliſts, knowing his Majeſty's mind, that he would not only maintain the ceſſation, but even deſigned to make peace with the Iriſh, were far from conſenting to the parliament's demand: ſo, the whole diſpute turned upon this point, whether the King had power to conclude a ceſſation, without the two houſes privity and concurrence; ſome affirming, others denying it. On each ſide, the ſame arguments were frequently repeated, with mutual reproaches for ſeveral proceedings; and almoſt all the facts alleged by one ſide, were denied by the other; ſo that neither party made any conceſſion.

p. 851, &c.

After a negociation of eighteen days, upon the three articles I have been mentioning, Charles's commiſſioners required that, his Majeſty's propoſitions, particularly thoſe concerning the ceſſation of arms, and his return to the parliament, might be conſidered. The other commiſſioners anſwered, that, when the two houſes ſhould ſee the treaty like to ſucceed, they would conſent to its prolongation. The two remaining days were imployed, by the King's commiſſioners, in trying to obtain that point: but they could not prevail. It muſt be recollected, that Charles's drift was to gain time, for two main reaſons. Firſt; as he was perſuaded that, the people, while they had any hope of peace, would not eaſily be induced to find the parliament neceſſary ſupplies for continuing of the war, and ſo the two houſes preparations would be retarded. Secondly; he rightly judged, the parliament would not ſeriouſly think of executing their project, concerning the army, while there ſhould be any expectation of peace. The two houſes, perceiving Charles's intention, avoided the ſnare, and the conferences brake off on the twenty days expiration.

p. 865.

The treaty breaks off.

The houſe of commons, or rather a new party which had been there formed, waited only for this rupture, to execute a project which I juſt mentioned, but whereon neceſſarily I muſt here be ſomewhat more particular, ſince the execution of this project ſerves for foundation to all the ſucceeding events.

State of King and parliament.

Before the parliament was aſſiſted by Scotland, the war had not been abundantly to its advantage. The ſucceſſes of the two firſt campains were ſo far from anſwering expectation, that to all appearance, without aſſiſtance from the Scots, they would have been forced to make ſuch a peace as King Charles wanted. If, in the third, that Prince had loſt all the North, he had made himſelf amends, by gaining near all the Weſtern counties, and, after the ſecond battle of Newbury, he was ſtill at Oxford in condition to face his oppoſers. The Scotiſh army, which, having ſubdued all the North, was advancing towards the middle of England, was therefore what made the balance incline to the parliament's ſide, and what was ſeemingly to give them a ſuperiority in the fourth campain, for which both ſides were preparing. This aid came very ſeaſonably, to eſtabliſh the affairs of the Preſbyterians, who were then in a manner omnipotent in the parliament, and diſpoſed of all juſt as they pleaſed. They were the men who had moſt conduced to ingage the kingdom in a war, and called in the Scots, becauſe they could not hope to execute their deſigns, unleſs the parliament's arms were victorious. But before I proceed, it will be abſolutely neceſſary to make known theſe Preſbyterians, who 'till then ſeemed to make but one and the ſame party, tho' in reality they conſiſted of two, very different from each other, both in principles and intereſts.

CHARLES I An' 1644.

Notwithſtanding all my ſedulity, I have not been able preciſely to find out the firſt riſe of the Independent ſect, or faction. Thus much is certain, their principles were very proper to put the kingdom in a flame, as they did effectually. With regard to the ſtate, they abhored monarchy, and approved only a republican government. As to religion, their principles were contrary to thoſe of all the reſt of mankind. They not only were averſe to epiſcopacy, and eccleſiaſtical hierarchy; but would not even indure ordinary miniſters in the church. They maintained, that every man might pray in public, exhort his brethren, interpret the ſcriptures, according to the talents wherewith God had indowed him; whereas, very frequently, miniſters were ordained without proper indowments, while thoſe of many laics remained uſeleſs for want of external ordination. So with them every one prayed, preached, admoniſhed, interpreted ſacred writ, &c. without any other call than what he himſelf drew from his zeal, and ſuppoſed gifts, and without any other authority than the approbation of his auditory (1).

Different origin of the Independents with regard to religion and civil government.

I cannot exactly tell, whether this ſect, or faction, was intirely formed at the begining of this parliament, or whether it ſprang up during the ſeſſions: but I fancy there is a diſtinction to be made upon this ſubject. I conjecture, that the ſect was already formed, with reſpect to civil government, and aroſe from the principles of deſpotiſm, which the Kings James and Charles labored to eſtabliſh; but that, with regard to religion, it was formed during this parliament. What I build my conjecture on is this: When the long parliament commenced, the Engliſh church had only two known parties, viz. Epiſcopalians, or Church-of-England men, and Preſbyterians. The name of Independent was utterly unknown, and thoſe ſtiled afterwards, Independents, were certainly united with the Preſbyterians, and made up a very conſiderable part of them. Yet were they different from the other Preſbyterians, as they propoſed for their end to convert the monarchy into a common-wealth, which cannot be imputed to the Preſbyterians in general. It is very true, the Preſbyterians were for humbling regal power, and leaving the King only a ſhadow of ſovereignty; but they preſerved a ſort of attachment to the name of King, and at leaſt ſome external reſpect for royalty. If we examine the propoſitions they preſented to Charles, at ſeveral times, we ſhall find them all erected on this baſis. They reſembled the Scots, who cannot juſtly be charged with deſigning to aboliſh monarchy, tho' they purpoſed to reduce it within very narrow limits. The Independents, after having lent their utmoſt aſſiſtance to a bridge kingly power, in hopes thereby to attain their end, the Engliſh monarchy's ruin, at length found they ſhould not be able, without the greateſt difficulty, to accompliſh their deſign. The reaſon was, becauſe neither the Engliſh nor Scotiſh Preſbyterians had any inclination to ſet up a republic, and becauſe their whole clergy, who had a great influence in that party, were of the like principles. They judged therefore, it would be very advantageous to them, to deſtroy the clergy's authority, by intimating their being unneceſſary, and their vocation eſtabliſhed on no good foundation. Then it was the Independent ſect began to be formed, with regard to religion; for there are no ſigns of it, 'till towards the cloſe of 1644. This I acknowledge to be mere conjecture, which may be rejected if any thing more plauſible occurs.

It is therefore no wonder that, from the begining of this parliament, the Independents had earneſtly contributed to put it out of the King's power to preſerve his authority otherwiſe than by a war, and to ruin the church of England. It is rather to be conſidered, that this was the natural conſequence of their principles, and a very proper means to conduct them to their ends. Humbling the King and ruining the church of England, were the two points which were neceſſarily to be gained, before the eſtabliſhment of a republic was attempted. It was not therefore proper they ſhould ſeparate from the Preſbyterians, while theſe latter concured with them in their deſign to gain theſe two principal points. For that reaſon, they readily conſented to call in the Scots, and made no ſcruple to approve the covenant, and whatever elſe was required by the Scots. The buſineſs then was, to be able to make head againſt Charles, who had, by the good ſucceſs of his arms, acquired ſome ſuperiority. This was the common intereſt of both Preſbyterians and Independents, who would have been equally ruined had the royaliſts prevailed.

The Independents begin to undermine the Preſbyterians power. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 465.

Mean while, the Scotiſh army, in ſtrengthening alike both Preſbyterians and Independents againſt their Sovereign, did withal confirm to theſe firſt the ſuperiority they had for ſome time injoyed. So long as this ſuperiority laſted, it was in a manner impoſſible for the Independents to compaſs their views: wherefore they judged it abſolutely neceſſary to undermine the great power of the Preſbyterians, not openly, for fear of being cruſhed before they had well laid their meaſures, but ſecretly and by artifice. To that purpoſe, the leaders of this party, as Vane, Cromwell, Tate, Haſlerig, with ſome others, began to make themſelves very popular, and to expreſs a great zeal for the public, in order to gain the peoples affection. They every where had their emiſſaries, who moſt ſeduloufly exagerated the errors commited ſince the war began, as well in the civil as military adminiſtration, and inſinuated, they were intirely to be aſcribed to the private views of many parliament-members, who, poſſeſſing all the places and offices, were very unmindful of terminating the nation's troubles: that ſome of the generals had deſignedly miſſed opportunities of fighting with advantage, and that, in ſhort, the majority dreaded nothing ſo much as ſeeing theſe diſturbances terminated, either by the ſword or a pacification.

To favor theſe ſpreading rumors, Cromwell, at the end of this campain, repaired to the parliament, and publicly charged the earl of Mancheſter with not having done his duty at Newbury-fight, and Dennington-caſtle; inſinuating, he was afraid of puting a too ſpeedy end to the war (1). The earl anſwered by a memorial, which he laid before their lordſhips; and Cromwell thought not fit to proſecute his accuſation, which properly was no other then a preparative towards the execution of a deeper project.

Charles I An' 1644.

Cromwell accuſes the earl of Mancheſter in parliament. p 431. Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 732, &c.

This open procedure of Cromwell raiſed a ſuſpicion, that he was one of the chief authors of thoſe rumors which tended to make people jealous of the parliament: nay, in a conference held at the earl of Eſſex's, it was debated whether or no Cromwell ſhould be arreſted; but as the proofs appeared not altogether clear enough, it was reſolved to wait 'till he ſhould have laid himſelf more open. Very poſſibly, ſome perſon preſent at this conference informed him of what paſſed, which put him on haſtening to execute the project formed by himſelf and his aſſociates.

Deſign of arreſting him laid aſide. Id. Vol. VI. p. 2. Whitelock, p. 116.

This project was, to exclude all the members of parliament from injoying any office or command, military or civil. It is certain that, from the war's begining, the parliament in diſtributing places had not forgot their own members, or rather to ſpeak truly, every good imploy was poſſeſſed by a member of one or other houſe. Hence aroſe two great inconveniencies. The firſt; that as, ſince the rupture with his Majeſty, both houſes had ruled arbitrarily, ſuch members as had poſts in the army had there ſo great influence, that none durſt oppoſe their motions, or take notice of their faults or miſdemeanors, which by that means were always unpuniſhed. This had finally, at the end of laſt campain, bred thoſe diſſenſions between the generals, which proved ſo prejudicial to the common cauſe. The ſecond inconvenience was; that it was undeniably the parliament's members particular intereſt to prolong the war; ſince terminating the troubles, whether effected by a deciſive battle, or a treaty, would ſtrip them of their imploys. This project was therefore founded upon reaſons very plauſible, and apt to make impreſſion on the people: but withal, it was of great advantage to the Independents, in that the Preſbyterian party's power would be conſiderably leſſened, and they had ſo well laid their meaſures, that they were almoſt ſure the vacant poſts would be filled with men of their own kidney. This was the more feaſible, as hitherto the Independents not having yet pulled off their maſk, it was not eaſy to diſcover who were ſuch, they being ſtill confounded with the Preſbyterians.

The parliamentn's partiality in diſtributing imploys, &c.

Project of the Independents.

To execute this grand ſcheme, the Independent leaders reſolved to make in parliament two motions. The firſt; to put the army under a new model; i. e. to form new regiments of horſe and foot out of the preſent troops, ſo that there would be ſtill the ſame officers and ſoldiers, but new bodies otherwiſe compoſed than before. The ſecond; that the parliament ſhould paſs an ordinance, excluding the members of either houſe from injoying or executing any office or command, civil or military. The firſt was founded on the neceſſity of rooting out factions and cabals, which might be formed in the ſeveral bodies of the army. The ſecond, on the neceſſity of demonſtrating to the public, that the parliament was not influenced by private views, but prefered the common good to their own members particular intereſts: but the Preſbyterian members thereby loſt at once all their poſts and credit in the army. This was the true reaſon of the Independents proceedings, which however they carefully concealed. The other reaſons were ſo plauſible, that they queſtioned not their being very agreeable to the people, who were already diſpoſed to approve them: and therefore it was preſumed few members would venture to contradict them, for fear of raiſing a ſuſpicion of their acting from ſelfiſh motives.

Ludlow. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 3.

December the ninth, 1644, theſe motions were made in the houſe of commons, when the Uxbridge treaty was preparing. The managers of this affair moved, to take into conſideration the kingdom's then condition, the reaſons why the war laſted ſo long, and the conſequences of the Uxbridge treaty, in caſe it was unſucceſsful. This motion being approved, the houſe voted themſelves into a grand commitee, to debate theſe points. A general ſilence being kept for ſome time, Oliver Cromwell at length riſing, ſpake to the following purport: viz.

Cromwell's ſpeech to the houſe of commons. p. 4.

"That it was now a time to ſpeak, or for ever "to hold the tongue: the important occaſion "being no leſs than to ſave a nation out of a "bleeding, nay almoſt dying condition, which "the long continuance of this war had already "brought it into; ſo that, without a more ſpeedy, "vigorous and effectual proſecution of the war, "caſting off all lingering proceedings, like ſoldiers "of fortune beyond ſea, to ſpin out a war, we "ſhall make the kingdom weary of us, and hate "the name of a parliament. For what do "the enemy ſay? Nay, what do many ſay, who "were friends at the begining of this parliament? "Even this; That the members of both houſes "have got great places and commands, and the "ſword in their hands; and, what by intereſt in "parliament, what by power in the army, will "perpetually continue themſelves in grandure, and "not permit the war ſpeedily to end, leſt their own "power ſhould determine with it. This I ſpeak "here, to our own faces, is but what others do "utter abroad, behind our backs. I am far from "reflecting on any; I know the worth of thoſe "commanders, members of both houſes, who are "yet in power: but if I may ſpeak my conſcience, "without reflecting upon any, I do conceive, if "the army be not put into another method, and "the war more vigorouſly proſecuted, the people "can bear the war no longer, and will inforce you "to a diſhonorable peace. But this I would re-"commend to your prudence, not to inſiſt upon "any complaint or over-ſight of any commander "in chief, upon any occaſion whatſoever; for as "I muſt acknowledge myſelf guilty of over-ſights, "ſo I know they can rarely be avoided in mili-"tary affairs: therefore waving a ſtrict inquiry into "the cauſes of theſe things, let us apply ourſelves to "the remedy, which is moſt neceſſary; and I hope, "we have ſuch true Engliſh hearts, and zealous "affections towards the general weal of our mother "country, as no members of either houſe will "ſcruple to deny themſelves, and their own private "intereſts, for the public good; nor account it "to be a diſhonor done to them, whatever the "parliament ſhall reſolve upon in this weighty "matter."

Motion to exclude all members from poſts. Ibid. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 435, 436, 466.

Cromwell was ſeconded by others who, like him, ſpake in generals, without making any particular propoſition. Finally, meſſ. Zouch, Tate and ſir Henry Vane moved expreſly, to have all members of parliament excluded from commands and offices. This motion was long debated, and at length approved by a majority of voices, and a commitee was appointed to prepare an ordinance to that purpoſe. Two days after, this ordinance was brought into the houſe, and it was reſolved, that the eighteenth of this month ſhould be ſet apart for a faſt, to implore a bleſſing on this affair, as well as on the intended new model of the army, which had been alſo voted, tho' I find not on what day. The fourteenth ditto, this ordinance was again taken into conſideration, and canvaſſed very ſeriouſly on both ſides. The eighteenth, the faſt was kept, and next day the ordinance paſſed the houſe of commons. It was termed 'the Self-denying Ordinance,' becauſe the houſe, in paſſing it, renounced their own advantages.

It is approved. Another for new modeling the army. Decemb. 11.

The ſelf-denying ordinance paſſes the commons. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI.. p. 7.

This affair however was not finiſhed 'till their lordſhips had approved this ordinance, to which they were no way diſpoſed: contrariwiſe, at a conference with the commons, they urged ſeveral reaſons againſt it. Hereupon, the thirteenth of January, the whole houſe of commons went up to the peers with a meſſage, to preſs them to paſs the ſelf-denying ordinance. Nevertheleſs, it was by them that very day rejected (1).

The lords reject it. January 13. Whitelock. Manley.

Notwithſtanding this, the commons proceeded in forming a new model of the army, which they voted ſhould conſiſt, in the whole, of twenty-one thouſand men, viz. ſix thouſand horſe, a thouſand dragoons, and fourteen thouſand foot: that the horſe ſhall be devided into ten regiments; the dragoons into ten ſingle companies; and the foot into ten regiments, of at leaſt twelve hundred men each. That ſetled, they appointed for general ſir Thomas Fairfax, ſon of lord Fairfax, who commanded in the North. Next they paſſed an ordinance for taking money for the maintenance of the army which was to ſerve under the new general, and ſent it up (January 18) to the lords for their concurrence (2). Their lordſhips ſcrupled conſenting to ſeveral articles which related to nominating the principal officers: but, as but few peers were preſent, they were told, they would do themſelves unſpeakable prejudice, if they pretended to oppoſe the commons reſolutions, and in ſhort, that their concurrence was not neceſſary. In all appearance, this induced their lordſhips to paſs the ordinance (February 15) without any amendments (3).

The nineteenth of that month, ſir Thomas Fairfax, being conducted to the houſe by four members, was complimented by the ſpeaker. After that, he delivered a liſt of the colonels he had appointed, by virtue of a clauſe in his commiſſion, among whom not one was a parliament-member. On this occaſion, there was likewiſe ſome difference between the two houſes: but, after ſeveral conferences, the lords approved that liſt, March the eighteenth.

Thus was the new model completed; and tho' the ſelf-denying ordinance had been thrown out by their lordſhips, the commons had now, by impowering the general to nominate the army-officers, obtained the excluſion of parliament-members from all military imploys. This made them hope, it would not be impoſſible to cauſe their ordinance to paſs: and in effect, it was (March 31.) ſent up to the peers for their conſent, tho' they had already refuſed it. Then, the earls of Eſſex, Denbigh, and Mancheſter, perceiving it would be in vain to ſtrive againſt the ſtream, and that their houſe was not in condition to oppoſe the commons, ſurrendered their commiſſions, and received the thanks of both houſes (1). Next day, the third of April, their lordſhips paſſed the ſelf-denying ordinance; and thus terminated this affair, which had been four months depending (2).

If we reflect, with what earneſtneſs the commons proceeded in the ſelf-denying ordinance, one is at firſt apt to believe, either that the number of Independents was very ſuperior in the houſe, or that the members were very diſintereſted: but neither of theſe was the caſe. The Preſbyterians ever preſerved a ſuperiority of number, which became ſtill greater by the members excluded from their poſts, who, not being imployed in the army, or elſewhere, increaſed their party in the parliament. As to the diſintereſtedneſs of the members, it is not to be imagined, that men who had thitherto expreſſed ſuch a greedineſs, as to monopoliſe, if I may ſo ſay, and ingroſs to themſelves all places of truſt and profit, ſhould thus ſuddenly change from black to white, and ſincerely deſire to relinquiſh them. But the caſe was, they were attacked on their weak ſide, and ſo could vindicate themſelves only by ſhewing a diſintereſtedneſs, which might at leaſt make it doubtful whether it was thro' ſelfiſhneſs that they had ingroſſed to themſelves all the poſts and offices. The Independents, before they diſcovered their deſign, had taken care to prepoſſeſs the people with many plauſible reaſons, why both houſes were in danger of being utterly deſerted, if they undertook to juſtify their conduct, and maintain their partiality. This certainly was what occaſioned the ordinance's paſſing, tho' it was manifeſtly deſigned to ruin the Preſbyterian party: for tho' their ſuperiority of number in the parliament ceaſed not, the Independents knew that, by having the army on their ſide, it would be in their power to obey the parliament no farther than they pleaſed. Accordingly, they bent their whole efforts this way, immediately when matters were regulated as they had projected. The new general was ſuppoſed a zealous Preſbyterian, and therefore the parliament had been allured to chuſe him: but Cromwell had over him ſuch influence, that he made him do whatever he pleaſed. He had artfully perſuaded him, that his ſole view was the welfare of religion, and his country's good, and thereby prepared him to receive his counſels, and repoſe in him intire confidence: for tho' the Independent party began to ſhew themſelves openly enough, they did not yet pretend to form a party ſeparate from that of the Preſbyterians, and it was more than a year before they appeared quite unmaſked. Cromwell eſpecially, more than any other of thoſe ſectarians, put on the appearance of a rigid Preſbyterian, and ſeemed to intend only the firm eſtabliſhment of Preſbytery. This was neceſſary to preſerve the confidence of the new general, and make him act according to his views, without diſcovering the end whereto he deſigned to conduct him: but it was not yet time to divulge his ſcheme. Two things only, abſolutely neceſſary for the advantage of his party, yet remained. One was, in new modeling the army, to order it ſo, that ſuch officers as the Independents preſumed they could confide in, might keep their commiſſions, and thoſe whom they conſidered as their enemies, might be caſhiered: for, as three armies were to be reduced into one, many officers would of courſe be diſmiſſed. The other point was, to proſecute the war more vigorouſly than ever, and more ſtrenouſly to labor at diſabling his Majeſty. It is evident, the Independents project could not be executed otherwiſe than by Charles's deſtruction: this was neceſſarily to be ſuppoſed; and conſequently, all hazards were to be run, to put a ſpeedy concluſion to the war, as nothing could to them be more prejudicial than its continuance.

Charles I An' 1645.

So ſoon as ſir Thomas Fairfax had received his commiſſion from both houſes, he came to Windſor, his head quarters, and diſpatched thence commiſſioners to every place where the parliament had troops, to form new regiments, and diſcharge the ſupernumerary officers. Undoubtedly, theſe commiſſioners, who were moſtly general-officers, had private inſtructions concerning ſuch officers as they were either to retain or diſmiſs; and Cromwell had framed in great meaſure theſe inſtructions, tho' he appeared not to be concerned. The parliament undertook this reform in a very dangerous ſeaſon; viz. in the month of April, when his Majeſty was preparing to take the field. If unhappily they had met with reſiſtance in the troops, as many apprehended, and if this change had occaſioned revolts, which might eaſily have happened by inſtigation of the diſbanded officers, they would have been without an army at the begining of a campain, and conſequently unable to ſtand againſt the royaliſts: but with pleaſure they learned, that all was effected with great tranquillity, and their orders every where implicitly obeyed.

General Fairfax forms the new army. April 3. Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 16. Holles. Sprigge.

General Fairfax remained at Windſor all April, not being able ſooner to finiſh what was wanting to prepare the army for action. During this interval, he received a letter from the commitee of both kingdoms, informing him, that the King had ſent to Prince Rupert, to join him with two thouſand horſe. He was therefore ordered to diſpatch a party of cavalry towards Oxford, to obſtruct this junction: and, as the ſelf-denying ordinance was not to take place 'till after forty days, viz. on the thirteenth day of May, the commitee particularly recommended the charge of his ſervice to lieutenant-general Cromwell.

Cromwell detached towards Oxford. Idem. Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 23, 24.

Cromwell, departing Windſor the twenty-fourth of April, met, near Iſlip-bridge, with a brigade of his Majeſty's cavalry, and utterly routed them (3). Then he marched to ſir Thomas Cogin's, at Blechington, where ſecretary Windebank's ſon held a gariſon for the King, and very magiſterially ſummoned that colonel, who immediately ſurrendered. The King was ſo inſenſed at his cowardice, that he had him condemned by a council of war, and afterwards ſhot to death. Cromwell gained ſome other advantages in thoſe quarters; but was repulſed in aſſaulting Farrington.

He is recalled, May 6.

The commitee of both kingdoms, having intelligence, that the King was, on the ſeventh of May, to head his army, perceived their error in ſending all their forces into the Weſt, and leaving all the mid-land parts of England quite naked. They therefore haſtily poſted away to their general a poſitive order, which reached him at Blandford, to return, and ſend only a party to relieve Taunton. Fairfax inſtantly obeyed; and, detaching colonel Welden, with about five thouſand foot and eighteen hundred horſe, to Taunton, returned back to Newbury, where he halted a few days to refreſh his troops.

On approach of the party ſent to Taunton, ſir Richard Greenvil raiſed the ſiege of that place, which could not have been relieved more ſeaſonably, ſo cloſely was it preſſed. But ſoon after, general Goring entered Somerſetſhire with three thouſand horſe, given him by his Majeſty when he heard Fairfax was marching to the Weſt. Then, Greenvil joining him, they went together, and again laid ſiege to Taunton, wherein were ſhut up all by whom it had been relieved.

During theſe motions of the parliament's forces King Charles (May the ſeventh) took the field * and marched towards Cheſter, to relieve that town, beſieged by ſir William Brereton (1). Mean while the parliament, perceiving his Majeſty was marching towards Cheſter, ſent general Fairfax orders to beſiege Oxford. Accordingly, Fairfax approached that city, and began the ſiege. But within few days, both houſes, hearing that Leiceſter was taken, apprehended Charles's deſign was to enter the Eaſtern aſſociated counties, and therefore ordered their general to raiſe the ſiege of Oxford, and purſue his Majeſty. Fairfax therefore marched away on the ſeventh of June. As, in all probability, a battle would very ſuddenly inſue, he wrote to requeſt the parliament, that they would diſpenſe with Cromwell's abſenſe from the houſe, and order his repairing to the army, to command the cavalry; which was readily granted. Thus Cromwell, who had been one of the moſt forward to paſs the ordinance for excluding parliament-members from all offices and poſts, civil and military, was the only perſon who held both his ſeat in parliament, and his command in the army. This would be a very honorable diſtinction for him, were there not room to ſuſpect it was owing to his own intrigues.

During all this, his Majeſty was in great perplexity. He was informed of the ſiege of Oxford, but did not yet know it was raiſed, and that the enemy was marching directly towards him. This made him reſolve to move towards Oxford, in order to relieve a city of ſuch importance to him. To that end, he incamped at Harborough, whence he diſpatched a courier to general Goring, ordering him to come and join him with all poſſible ſpeed. Here it was he received intelligence, that Fairfax was drawn off from Oxford, and had been repulſed with great loſs, in the attack he made upon Borſtal houſe †. His troops, as uſual, were ſo elated at this news, that they imagined the enemies to be in the utmoſt conſternation, which ought to be improved by immediately giving them battle. The King himſelf was prepoſſeſſed with this notion, which made him contemn his enemies, and unfortunately induced him to advance to Daventry, in Northamptonſhire, in a belief it would be always in his power to fight when he pleaſed, and that his enemies would never dare to attack him. Otherwiſe, he might have retired to Leiceſter, and there quietly expected the three thouſand men, which colonel Gerrard was to bring him from Wales, and Goring's three thouſand horſe from the Weſt. As to Goring, a certain accident happened, which very much conduced to haſten a battle. Fairfax had ſent to Oxford a perſon who, pretending to ſerve the King, had managed ſo artfully, that ſecretary Nicholas had intruſted him with a pacquet to general Goring, who was before Taunton. This man having diſcharged his commiſſion, Goring thought he could not imploy, to carry his Majeſty a letter, a more truſty meſſenger than the perſon ſent him by ſecretary Nicholas. He gave him therefore a diſpatches for the King, wherein he told his Majeſty, that he hoped to be maſter of Taunton in a ſhort time: conjuring him not to ingage, but to ſtand on the defenſive; for he did not queſtion, in twelve or fourteen days, to join him with the forces under his command. Charles knew nothing of this letter, which was brought to Fairfax; but it convinced the parliament-generals of the abſolute neceſſity of fighting, before this aid joined his Majeſty.

Fairfax reſolves to fight.

Purſuant to this reſolution, Fairfax continued to advance towards the King, who, being better informed of the number and deſigns of his enemies, reſolved on retiring to Leiceſter. To that purpoſe, he began his march towards Harborough, where his van arrived while the reſt of the army was yet above two miles behind. That ſame night, he heard the enemies were within ſix miles of Harborough, and indeed general Ireton, Cromwell's ſon-in-law, had now fallen upon ſome of the King's quarters, and taken ſeveral priſoners. Thereupon it was reſolved, at a council of war held in the night, to march back and meet the enemy, conſidering the impoſſibility of going to Leiceſter, without expoſing the rear to certain deſtruction. So the King, returning in the morning, met the parliamentarians, who, on news of his march, had drawn up near Naſeby. Here was fought that fatal battle which decided the quarrel between King Charles and his parliament.

Prince Rupert commanded the right wing of the King's army, and ſir Marmaduke Langdale the left. Sir Jacob Aſtley (2) led the main body of infantry, and King Charles himſelf headed the reſerve of cavalry (3). On the parliament's ſide, the right wing of horſe was commanded by Cromwell, the left by Ireton. General Fairfax, and major-general Skippon, were at the head of the main body, the firſt on the right, and the other on the left (4).

Rupert began with charging the left wing, commanded by Ireton, and, after a long conflict, wherein he met with great reſiſtance, brake that body of cavalry, put them to flight, and chaſed the fugitives almoſt to Naſeby (1). In his return, he loſt ſome time in trying to poſſeſs himſelf of the parliament's artillery: he even ſummoned the the train; but they being well defended with firelocks and a rear guard, and he without infantry, he could not execute his deſign.

At the ſame time, Cromwell was ingaged in a very obſtinate fight with ſir Marmaduke Langdale, but at length the King's cavalry took to flight, and were purſued about a quarter of a mile. After that Cromwell, leaving a party of horſe to oppoſe the King's in caſe they ſhould rally, returned with ſpeed to the field of battle, where his aſſiſtance was greatly wanted by his friends.

The parliament's foot were ingaged with the King's, and began to be preſſed in ſuch a manner, that they were in great diſorder. Cromwell, who was returned victorious, changed the face of the battle, by charging in flank the King's infantry, who could not ſtand ſo vigorous a ſhock. Fairfax and Skippon took advantage of this aſſiſtance to rally their troops, who had been roughly handled at the begining of the battle (2), and at laſt, the King's foot were ſo routed, that there was no poſſibility of rallying them.

Mean while, Prince Rupert not being yet returned from the chaſe, his Majeſty, with his reſerve of horſe, was unable to charge Cromwell, who was ſtronger than himſelf, and was alſo rejoined by the party he had left behind. As ſoon as Rupert was returned with his victorious cavalry, and had joined the reſerve, the King uſed his utmoſt indeavors to perſuade them to charge once more the enemy's horſe, not queſtioning that, if he could once rout them, he ſhould eaſily trample down the infantry. But he could not prevail with them to make a ſecond charge (3). This is not to be wondered at, ſince it could not be done without manifeſt danger. Fairfax, Skippon and Cromwell, without loſing time in purſuing Charles's diſperſed infantry, had ſpeedily rallied their troops. They faced the King's cavalry, and prepared to receive, or charge them. So, to renew the fight, his Majeſty muſt, with a ſingle wing of horſe, and his ſmall body of reſerve, have fallen upon the enemies army, which wanted only the wing which had been routed. This the cavaliers clearly perceived, and was what hindered them from obeying the King's orders. At the ſame time, ſomething occured, which made them take to flight, or furniſhed them with a pretenſe. The earl of Carnewarth, obſerving his Majeſty, notwithſtanding the unwillingneſs of his own troops, bent on charging the enemies, rode up to him and ſaid, 'Sir, will 'you go upon your death in an inſtant?' And withal, laying hold on the King's bridle, turned his horſe to the right. The King's cavalry ſeeing his Majeſty's horſe turned, without knowing the cauſe, took occaſion to diſband, and rode off on the ſpur, without looking behind. So, Charles was likewiſe obliged to retire, and leave his enemies maſters of the field (4). All his infantry were ſo diſperſed, that the enemies took as many priſoners as they pleaſed. He loſt his whole train of artillery, all his bag and baggage, with his cabinet, wherein were his moſt ſecret papers and letters, which the parliament were ſo cruel as to print and publiſh, particularly his letters concerning the Uxbridge treaty, whereof the reader has before ſeen ſome extracts. After this he was never more able to bring into the field any conſiderable army. It is ſaid, there were not ſlain on the King's ſide above ſix hundred men, but among them were more than a hundred and fifty officers; and beſide the enemy took upwards of five thouſand priſoners.

His Majeſty and Prince Rupert, that ſame day, retreated by Leiceſter to Aſhby de la Zouch, whence, after a few hours refreſhment, they continued marching with their cavalry in very great diſorder to Hereford, where they parted. Rupert haſted to Briſtol, to prepare the city for a ſiege, there being great likelihood it would quickly be attacked. The King retired into Wales, and made ſome ſtay at Ragland-caſtle, not deſpairing of being able to form another army in thoſe parts. The reaſon is unknown why, contrary to all appearance, he was bent on raiſing a new army in Wales, and the neighboring counties, inſtead of marching into the Weſt with his horſe, where he had a ſtrong body of troops, under the command of Goring and Greenvil, with which he might have long continued the war.

Mean while, Fairfax advanced towards Leiceſter, which ſurrendered by capitulation, four days after the battle of Naſeby. Then, he marched with all ſpeed to the Weſt, whither it was very neceſſary to lead the army, as well to relieve Taunton and the party there ſhut up, as to reduce to the parliament's obedience thoſe Weſtern counties, which were all for his Majeſty. At the army's approach, Goring raiſed the ſiege of Taunton, and in few days was defeated at Langport by Fairfax, who killed many of his men, took twelve hundred horſes, and fourteen hundred priſoners (5). This victory was followed with the taking of Bridgewater, Bath and Sherburn, after which Fairfax laid ſiege to Briſtol.

It was univerſally expected that, as uſual, Prince Rupert would perform wonders in defenſe of this city, which was ſtrongly gariſoned (6) and well ſtored with all proviſions and ammunition: nay, his Highneſs had ſent the King word, he hoped to hold out at leaſt four months. Nevertheleſs, the parliament-army approaching the lines drawn about the place, and repulſing ſeveral ſallies, Rupert on the very firſt ſummons agreed to capitulate. Fairfax came near the lines, the twenty-third of Auguſt, and the capitulation was ſigned the tenth of September, before the beſiegers had approached the walls. When his Majeſty underſtood Prince Rupert had ſurrendered Briſtol in this manner, he was ſo inraged, that he ordered him, by a letter, to depart the kingdom, and revoked all his commiſſions. The Prince publiſhed a manifeſto, in vindication of his conduct: but he did not ſufficiently demonſtrate the neceſſity of ſurrendering ſo haſtily a place of ſuch importance (7).

But to prevent the miſchiefs incurred by the earl of Eſſex, laſt year, for want of free intercourſe with London, he ordered Cromwell, with a party of horſe, to take thoſe places which might obſtruct ſuch communication. September the twenty-ſixth, the general called a council of war, where it was reſolved, that the army ſhould march farther Weſtward. But as the Prince of Wales was in thoſe parts, with Goring's, Greenvil's, and ſome other troops, which all together made a conſiderable body, the general was apprehenſive of meeting many difficulties in this expedition, and therefore thought it incumbent on him to ſecure the communication with London. To that purpoſe, he again detached Cromwell, with orders to indeavor taking the caſtle of Wincheſter, and then Baſing-houſe, which had been twice beſieged in vain.

Cromwell, with his accuſtomed promptneſs, marching directly to Wincheſter, took the city and caſtle upon articles. After that, the army marched towards Exeter, the capital of Devonſhire. But as this place was ſtrong and well gariſoned, and the ſeaſon not proper for ſo important a ſiege, they reſolved on a blocade, 'till it could be inveſted in form.

The Prince of Wales aſſembles forces in the Weſt. Ibid.

While the general was imployed in ordering the blocade, which held 'till December, and in building neceſſary forts on the Eaſt ſide of the Ex, the Prince of Wales had time to aſſemble all his Majeſty's forces in thoſe parts, with the Corniſh militia, and form an army eight thouſand ſtrong. Fairfax, hearing the enemies were preparing to march againſt him, reſolved to prevent it, by advancing towards them. He made ſuch ſpeed that he ſurpriſed a brigade of their cavalry, commanded by lord Wentworth, and took between three and four hundred horſes. This obliged the King's generals to proceed with more caution, raiſe the blocade of Plymouth to ſtrengthen their army, and paſs the Tamar, in order to retire into Cornwal.

The Prince's retreat into Cornwal gave Fairfax opportunity to attack Dartmouth, a ſea-port of great conſequence, which he took by ſtorm, the ſeaſon not allowing him to beſiege it formally.

After all theſe advantages, Fairfax returned to Exeter, and finiſhed the blocade of that city. Soon after, he left the command of it to ſir Hardreſs Waller, and went himſelf to meet lord Hopton, who was marching to the relief of Exeter, at the head of ſeven or eight thouſand men. General Goring being withdrawn into France, the Prince of Wales had given the command of his army to lord Hopton. Fairfax approaching the enemies, had intelligence that lord Hopton was intrenched in Torrington, to oblige him either to attack him thus advantageouſly poſted, or to keep the field in a very rainy ſeaſon, in a country which had few villages to ſhelter his army from the weather. Fairfax, having weighed the inconveniencies of leaving the enemies thus intrenched, reſolved to attack them. To that end, he advanced within a mile of Torrington, and poſſeſſed himſelf of ſome poſts, with deſign to ingage on the morrow. But Hopton's troops attempting, in the night, to diſlodge the parliamentarians, and theſe latter receiving aſſiſtance from the army, the battle began inſenſibly, and held 'till near morning. Finally, after a long conflict in the dark, lord Hopton's intrenchments were forced, and himſelf obliged to retire with his cavalry, and only four or five hundred of the four thouſand foot he had before the ingagement. Thus all his infantry were ſlain, taken, or ſo diſperſed that it was not poſſible for ſuch as got away to rejoin their general, who was retired into Cornwal (3).

Fairfax, after this freſh victory, judged his main buſineſs was utterly to deſtroy the enemy's cavalry which had eſcaped from Torrington, conſiſting of three thouſand, and prevent their joining his Majeſty. Inſtead therefore of returning to Exeter, he determined on marching into Cornwal with his whole army. He ſet out the twenty-third of February, and ſeizing the paſſes of the river Tamar, left there ſtrong guards, as alſo in all places where he thought the enemies might attempt paſſing, if they intended, as was very likely, to join the King. while, lord Hopton was extremely imbaraſſed, and the more, as thoſe of Cornwal, who before were devoted to the King, began to alter their minds, and even voluntarily offered general Fairfax their aſſiſtance to ſtop up their paſſes, and hinder the King's forces from eſcaping. Finally, the parliament-army approaching Truro, where Hopton had his head-quarters, Fairfax ſent to proffer him honorable terms, in caſe he would capitulate. While he waited his anſwer, he ſtill advanced towards the enemies, and beating up one of their quarters, took three hundred horſes. But to avoid being unneceſſarily circumſtantial, I ſhall content myſelf with briefly ſaying, that Hopton, ſeeing himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides, and deſpairing to eſcape, agreed to capitulate. By this treaty, ſigned the fourteenth of March, it was ſtipulated; That all the forces under lord Hopton's command ſhould be diſbanded *, with leave to go beyond ſea, or to their homes: that all the horſes and arms ſhould be delivered to general Fairfax; and upon performance thereof, each trooper ſhould receive twenty ſhillings, or his horſe: that paſſes ſhould be given to ſuch as deſired to go beyond ſea, on their promiſing never more to bear arms againſt the parliament of England (1). This treaty conſiſts of diverſe other articles, which it is needleſs to ſpecify, as they concerned only the manner how the treaty was to be executed. Lords Hopton and Culpepper withdrew to Scilly, before the treaty was ſigned. Thus was Charles's army in the Weſt intirely diſperſed. This accompliſhed, Fairfax returned before Exeter, which was ſurrendered, upon articles the ninth of April, 1646. With this city's reduction ended his Weſtern expedition, which could not be more glorious to him, than advantageous to the parliament, having left his Majeſty neither towns nor forces in all thoſe quarters.

It is now time to examine what paſſed in other parts of England while the parliamentarians were imployed in reducing the Weſtern counties.

What was done by the Scots in England, in 1645. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 118, 120.

The Scotiſh army, having taken Newcaſtle in October, 1644, divided into two bodies, one whereof beſieged Carliſle, which ſurrendered upon articles in June, 1645.

The other part of their army dared not ingage in a ſiege, becauſe the marquis of Montroſe, who ſerved the King in Scotland, having had great ſucceſs there, it was to be feared, Charles would think of ſending him reinforcements: wherefore the Scots always kept in a readineſs to oppoſe it. This became ſtill more neceſſary after Naſeby-fight, there being great likelihood of his Majeſty's reſolving to join Montroſe, with his cavalry; beſide the Scots, by keeping thus in the middle of England, prevented the King from making new levies in thoſe parts. At length, after taking Carliſle, the two bodies being re-joined, they beſieged Hereford, about the end of July: but after having in vain puſhed that ſiege more than a month, they raiſed it early in September. Their general, the earl of Leven, publiſhed on this occaſion, a ſort of apology, wherein was ſaid, among other particulars, that, for ſix or ſeven months, they had received but one month's pay: that they had been promiſed to be ſuplied with all things neceſſary for a ſiege; in which they had been extremely diſappointed, ſince they had received but three pieces of cannon, with fifty ball to each: that they had ſcarce any cavalry; and being informed the King was marching towards them with three thouſand horſe, it was impoſſible to continue the ſiege: laſtly; that general Leſley was obliged to go into Scotland, with his whole party of horſe and dragoons, to oppoſe Montroſe.

After the ſiege at Hereford was raiſed, the Scotiſh army retired into Yorkſhire, loudly enough complaining of being quite neglected. Hereupon the parliament aſſigned them thirty thouſand pounds, provided they appeared before Newark * and ordered that the Eaſtern aſſociation ſhould pay them fourteen hundred pounds weekly. The Scots agreeing to theſe terms, the ſiege of Newark was begun about the cloſe of October, 1645, and laſted 'till May, 1646.

I left King Charles in Wales after the battle of Naſeby, where he was imployed in ſeeking means to raiſe a new army. As to the diſpoſing of his perſon, it was ſcarcely poſſible he ſhould come to any reſolution, before he knew how his enemies deſigned to proceed after their victory: but when he ſaw general Fairfax, with his army, ingaged in the Weſtern counties, he departed from his retreat with his cavalry, three thouſand ſtrong. As the parliament had but very few forces in the mid-land parts, his Majeſty came without danger to Lichfield, and thence entering the aſſociated counties, he took Huntington, where he met with a great booty, after which he went to Oxford. He departed thence in three days, taking with him what forces could be ſpared, and marched to Camden.

The parliament, judging Charles's deſign was to relieve either Briſtol or Hereford, both beſieged at once, gave orders to major-general Pointz and colonel Roſſiter to aſſemble what forces they could, and diligently attend his Majeſty's motions. Accordingly, they drew together about two thouſand horſe, and poſted themſelves between the King and Oxford. But, at the ſame time, the Scots having voluntarily raiſed the ſiege of Hereford, King Charles marched thither, where he continued 'till the twentieth of September. As the King then expected from Ireland a body of troops, which could land only at Cheſter, this city was of ſuch great conſequence to him, that he immediately marched to diſlodge the enemies from that part they had in their power. He was no ſooner on his march, but Poyntz cloſely followed, and overtook him within two miles of Cheſter, which obliged him to turn againſt his purſuers. The fight at firſt was pretty obſtinate; but as his Majeſty had five thouſand men and the enemy barely two thouſand, Poyntz was briſkly repulſed, and put into great diſorder. once attacked before and behind, were at length utterly routed, ſix hundred men being killed on the ſpot, and a thouſand taken priſoners. There fell on his Majeſty's ſide, the earl of Lichfield, and ſome other officers of quality. It was with great difficulty that Charles, with the remnant of his army, got into Wales, where he continued ſome time *, after which, with a party about three thouſand ſtrong, he came to Newark, in Notinghamſhire. There he ſtayed 'till, fearing to be beſieged by the Scots, who were approaching, he went away by night, and ſafely arrived at Oxford, the ſixth of November, there not being left any other remedy than to make peace with the parliament.

and retires into Wales. Ibid. * At Denbigh-caſtle.

Gets to Oxford. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 118.

But this peace was not to be procured eaſily. His Majeſty, in the then ſituation of his affairs, would willingly have conceded part of what he had before refuſed; but cared not to yield all. The parliament, on their ſide, were willing to make peace, like conquerors, and by agravating the terms, inſtead of rendering them more tolerable.

His London friends put him in hope of peace. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 572, &c.

Mean while, nothwithſtanding the difficulties which were naturally to occur in the concluſion of a peace, Charles's friends at London made him hope, that the diſſenſions between the Preſbyterians and Independents might turn to his advantage. It was intimated to him; That the Preſbyterians were inraged to ſee the Independent party daily increaſe in number and ſtrength, and that it was not doubted but, if he could obtain liberty to come up thither and treat perſonally with the two houſes, the Preſbyterian members would find means to conclude a peace, in order to be freed from this yoke of the Independents: that the city of London was almoſt wholly Preſbyterian; that his Majeſty had there alſo many friends, and if the parliament expreſſed a diſpoſition for peace, which was very likely, it would not be in the Independents power to prevent its being concluded. This was all extremely well; but they ſhould have firſt explained how and in what ſenſe the word Peace was to be underſtood. Very ſeemingly, the parliament, or Preſbyterian party, which ſtill prevailed, would very gladly have conſented to a peace, had Charles been willing to grant two points, which were by them conſidered as abſolutely neceſſary; viz. the abolition of epiſcopacy, and ſufficient ſecurity for performance of his promiſes: for in theſe alone conſiſted the parliament's ſcheme for a peace. But this was not that Monarch's aim. His conſtant meaning was, to make ſuch a peace as he deſired, and which I have often explained and ſpecified. True, in his preſent circumſtances, he was willing, with regard to the ſecurity, to grant ſomething more than what he had yet offered: but nothing could prevail with him to conſent to the abolition of epiſcopacy. So, by ever preſerving the ambiguity in the term Peace, he imagined, if he could obtain liberty to come and treat at London with the two houſes, it would not be impracticable, with the help of his friends, to force the parliament to make peace with him according to his own ſenſe of the word, tho' nothing was farther from the intention of both houſes.

He in vain attempts bringing the parliament to a peace. p. 573, &c. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 215, 216.

In this belief, the fifth of December, he demanded of the two houſes a ſafe-conduct for the duke of Richmond, the earl of Southampton, John Aſhburnham and Jeffery Palmer, eſqs. who were to bring propoſitions for a peace.

The fifteenth ditto, he renewed his demand, complaining of his having received no anſwer.

The twenty-ſixth, he ſent them a third meſſage, wherein he ſaid:

"That, conceiving the former treaties had "hitherto proved ineffectual, chiefly for want of "power in thoſe perſons who treated, as likewiſe, "becauſe thoſe from whom their power was derived "could not give ſo clear a judgment as was "requiſite: if therefore he might have the ingage- "ment of the two houſes at Weſtminſter; the "commiſſioners of the parliament of Scotland; "the mayor, aldermen, common-council, and mi- "litia of London; of the chief commanders in "ſir Thomas Fairfax's army, as alſo of thoſe in "the Scots army, for his free and ſafe coming to, "and abode in London, or Weſtminſter, for the "ſpace of forty days; he would come and have "a perſonal treaty with the two houſes of parlia- "ment at Weſtminſter, and the commiſſioners of "the parliament of Scotland, upon all matters "which might conduce to the reſtoring peace and "happineſs to his kingdoms.

"He declared beforehand, that he was willing "to commit the great truſt of the militia, for ſuch "time, and with ſuch powers, as were expreſſed "in the paper delivered, by his commiſſioners, at "Uxbridge, to thirty perſons he named: but if "this did not ſatisfy the parliament, then he of- "fered to name the one half, and leave the other "to the election of both houſes."

Before the two houſes received this laſt meſſage, they had ſent the following anſwer to the two firſt:

"That, finding former treaties had been made Decemb. 25. "uſe of for other ends, under the pretenſe of peace, p. 217. "and had proved dilatory and unſucceſsful, they "could not give way to a ſafe-conduct, accord- "ing to his Majeſty's deſire. But both houſes "of the parliament of England, having under "their conſideration propoſitions and bills for the "ſetling a ſafe and well-grounded peace, which "were ſpeedily to be communicated to the com- "miſſioners of the kingdom of Scotland, did re- "ſolve, after mutual agreement of both king- "doms, to preſent them with all ſpeed to his "Majeſty."

To this Charles replied, the twenty-ninth of December. He complained, that a ſafe-conduct was denied for the perſons he intended to ſend. He inſiſted on his demand of a perſonal treaty, and deſired an anſwer to his meſſage of the twenty-ſixth. He ſaid, he ſhould never have thought of coming to London, if it was not his ſincere intention to make peace.

The fifteenth of January, 1645-6, he ſent to both houſes another meſſage, wherein he complained of not having been anſwered. He ſaid, "That what "he earneſtly deſired was peace, and the means, "his perſonal preſenſe at Weſtminſter; where the "government of the church being ſetled, as it was "in the time of Queen Elizabeth, and King James, "and full liberty for the eaſe of their conſciences "who would not communicate in that ſervice eſta- "bliſhed by law, and likewiſe for the free and "public uſe of the directory to ſuch as ſhould deſire "to uſe the ſame; and all forces being agreed to "to be diſbanded: his Majeſty would then forth- "with join with his two houſes of parliament, in "ſetling ſome way for payment of the public "debts, to his Scotiſh ſubjects, the city of Lon- "don, and others. And having propoſed a fair "way for ſetling the militia, he would indeavor, "upon debate with his two houſes, ſo to diſpoſe "of it, as likewiſe of the buſineſs of Ireland, as "might give them and both kingdoms ſatiſ- "faction: not doubting alſo, but to give good con- "tentment to his two houſes of parliament in the "choice of the lord-admiral, the officers of ſtate, "and others."

The thirteenth of January, 1645-6, two days p. 219. before the date of this laſt meſſage, both houſes had returned their anſwer to that of the twenty-ninth of December, viz.

"That

CHARLES I An' 1645.

" That there had been a great deal of innocent " blood of his ſubjects ſhed in the war, by his " Majeſty's commands and commiſſions.

" That there had been Iriſh rebels brought over " into both kingdoms, and indeavors to bring " over more, as alſo forces from foreign parts.

" That his Majeſty was in arms in thoſe parts, " and the Prince at the head of an army in the " Weſt; there were alſo forces in Scotland againſt " that parliament and kingdom, by his commiſ- " ſion; and the war in Ireland was fomented and " prolonged by his Majeſty.

" That, until ſatisfaction and ſecurity was firſt " given to both kingdoms, his Majeſty's coming " to the parliament could not be convenient, nor " by them aſſented unto.

" That they could not apprehend it a means " conducing to peace, that his Majeſty ſhould " come to his parliament for a few days, with any " thoughts of leaving it, eſpecially with intentions " of returning to hoſtility againſt it.

" That his Majeſty deſired the ingagement not " only of his parliaments, but of the lord-mayor " of London, &c. which was againſt the privi- " leges and honor of parliaments, thoſe being " joined with them who were ſubject and ſubor- " dinate to their authority.

" That the only way for obtaining a happy and " well-grounded peace was, for his Majeſty to " give his aſſent to thoſe propoſitions which ſhould " be ſent to him.

" That there was not ſo much as any mention " of Scotland."

Jan. 17. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 220.

The King, in a reply to this anſwer, ſtrongly complained of the aſperſions caſt on him by both houſes, and reproached them in his turn. He inſiſted on their anſwer to his meſſage of the fifteenth of December, ſaying, " No rational man could " think their laſt paper to be any anſwer to his " former demands."

But the twenty-fourth ditto, he ſent a farther reply to every particular article of that anſwer. The ſubſtance whereof was:

1. " That a great deal of innocent blood had " been ſhed."

That is the very reaſon why he preſſeth that there ſhould be no more (1).

REMARK (1) The meaning of this objection of both houſes was, that there having been much blood ſpilled in the war, it was reaſonable the authors thereof ſhould be puniſhed, and that the King continuing to protect them, it was neceſſary to proſecute the war 'till he ſhould be obliged to deliver them to juſtice. So, Charles's general reply upon this article anſwered not the objection.

2. " That he had cauſed ſome Iriſh to repair to " his aſſiſtance." He anſwered, that thoſe whom they called Iriſh, were indeed (for the moſt part) ſuch Engliſh Proteſtants as had been formerly ſent into Ireland by the two houſes, and unable to ſtay there any longer by the neglect of thoſe who ſent them thither, who ſhould have better provided for them (2).

REM. (2) The objection related not to ſuch Engliſh forces as his Majeſty had ſent for from Ireland. The two houſes were far from giving thoſe ſoldiers the name of Iriſh. But they underſtood thoſe Iriſh Papiſts whom this Prince entertained in his army, and particularly ten thouſand ſuch, whom the earl of Glamorgan was to bring over. Charles feigned not to comprehend the two houſes meaning, and anſwered their objection thus evaſively.

3. " That the Prince was at the head of an " army." Charles replied: It was no great wonder, ſince there was yet no peace.

4. " That he deſired to come to his parliament " but for a few days." He anſwered by proteſting, that he ſought that treaty to avoid future hoſtility, and procure a laſting peace (3).

CHARLES I An' 1645.

REM. (3) The parliament did not at all queſtion it. But they thought he would come to London only to compel, by means of his friends, both houſes to make ſuch a peace as he deſired. So, this general anſwer was not at all ſatisfactory.

5. " That the ingagements which his Majeſty " had deſired for his ſecurity, were a breach of " privilege." His Majeſty replied; That whoſoever ſhould call to mind the particular occaſions which inforced him to quit London and Weſtminſter, would judge his demand very reaſonable, and neceſſary for his ſafety. But he no way conceived, how the lord-mayor, aldermen, &c. of London, were either ſubject or ſubordinate to the authority of the two houſes.

6. " That he had made no mention of Scot- " land." He anſwered; That was included in his former, and had been particularly mentioned in his latter meſſage of the fifteenth.

Laſtly, He deſired a poſitive anſwer to his former meſſages.

The twenty-ninth of January, Charles ſent another meſſage to both houſes, wherein he expreſly diſavowed the earl of Glamorgan, concerning any treaty with the Iriſh rebels. And ſaid, " That earl having made offer unto him to raiſe " forces in the kingdom of Ireland, and to con- " duct them into England for his Majeſty's ſer- " vice, he had granted him a commiſſion to that " purpoſe, and to that purpoſe only; but that he " had no commiſſion at all to treat of any thing elſe, " without the privity and directions of the lord- " lieutenant: and this clearly appeared by the lord- " lieutenant's proceedings with the ſaid earl, who " had orders to call him to account (4). p. 222.

REM. (4) The diſguiſe his Majeſty uſed on this occaſion, will manifeſty appear in what is preſently to follow, touching this treaty.

Charles added, " That if the two houſes would " admit his repair to London for a perſonal treaty, " ſpeedy notice ſhould be given him thereof, and " a ſafe-conduct, with a blank ſent for a meſ- " ſenger to be immediately diſpatched into Ire- " land, to ſtop the concluſion of the peace; the lord- " lieutenant being impowered to treat and con- " clude it.

" That he would leave the management of the " buſineſs of Ireland wholly to the two houſes, " and make no peace there but with their conſent, " in caſe his indeavors in the treaty ſhould be " bleſſed with ſucceſs.

" That if his perſonal repair to London ſhould " be admited, and a peace thereon inſue, he " would then leave the nomination of the perſons " to be intruſted with the militia wholly to his " two houſes, with ſuch power and limitations as " were expreſſed in the paper delivered, by his " Majeſty's commiſſioners, at Uxbridge, the ſixth " of February, 1644-5.

" That if the peace ſucceeded, he would be " content, that ' pro hac vice,' the two houſes " ſhould nominate the admiral, officers of ſtate, " and judges, to hold their places during life, or " ' quamdiu ſe bene geſſerint,' to be accountable " to none but the King and the two houſes of par- " liament.

" That, as for matter of religion, he intended, " that all Proteſtants ſhould have the free exer- " ciſe of their religion according to their own " way.

" That, upon the concluſion of peace, there " ſhould be a general act of oblivion and free " pardon.

" And this to extend to Scotland.

This Prince had never before made ſuch advances, vances, and yet all his efforts to obtain a ſafe-conduct were ineffectual. The two houſes were ſo perſuaded of his ability in the choice of his expreſſions, which were commonly ambiguous, and capable of a different ſenſe from what appeared at firſt ſight, that they could not reſolve to treat with him upon his own propoſitions: beſide, they doubted not, but the overture of a perſonal treaty was deſigned for a ſnare, to force them to ſuch a peace as he wanted. They therefore returned not to his ſeveral meſſages any other anſwer than what has been ſeen. So, this ſort of negociation, of which his Majeſty expected a happy event, only left matters juſt as they were.

Charles's project to make peace with the rebels. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 238. Cox, Part II. p. 134.

Both houſes, as we have ſeen, reproached King Charles, that he was indeavoring to bring Iriſh troops into England. His Majeſty did not diſown it; but denied his giving the earl of Glamorgan power to treat with the rebels upon any other article. This was literally true; but his Majeſty took care not to diſcover the whole extent of this article, and yet both houſes were perfectly informed of it, as in the ſequel will appear. To underſtand fully the objection and anſwer, it will be neceſſary to relate what paſſed in Ireland upon this ſubject. This is not one of the leaſt curious points of Charles I's reign, tho' lord Clarendon has thought fit to paſs it over in ſilence.

Ruſhworth, Vol. V. p. 895, 920. * Murrough O'Brien.

The ceſſation King Charles had made with the Iriſh rebels, had not intirely ſuſpended hoſtilities in that iſland. Lord Inchiquin * who commanded in Munſter for the parliament, and major-general Monroe, who was at the head of the Scots in Ulſter, had refuſed to accept the ceſſation (1). On the other hand, thoſe Engliſh troops which Charles had drawn from Ireland, had been intirely ruined and diſperſed in England. Thus had his Majeſty reaped no advantage by this ceſſation, the motives whereof he had concealed with all poſſible care. He had pretended, he was indiſpenſibly obliged to conclude it, in order to ſave the Engliſh from the utter deſtruction they were threatened with by the rebels ſuperiority, and the parliament's neglect to ſend ſupplies into Ireland: but when theſe Engliſh forces were ſeen paſſing over into England, it was eaſy to perceive the true reaſon of that ceſſation.

King Charles, not having reaped all the advantage he expected from this artifice, deſiſted not from his deſign of making uſe of the Iriſh to continue war with the parliament. Contrariwiſe, he projected a pacification with the rebels, in order to imploy, not only the other Engliſh troops yet in Ireland, but alſo a good body of Iriſh, whom he intended to ſend for into England. He ordered therefore the marquis of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, to negociate this pacification, wherein however occurred difficulties ſeemingly inſurmountable. To make peace with the Iriſh, thoſe people were neceſſarily to be ſatisfied in point of creed: but this his Majeſty could not do, without breaking thro' all his proteſtations with regard to his ardent zeal for the Proteſtant religion, and without, in ſome meaſure, confirming the ſuſpicions of thoſe who believed him concerned in the Iriſh rebellion. In a word, he could not take this ſtep, without relinquiſhing the Iriſh Proteſtant's intereſt, and giving the Papiſts ſuch advantages, as would render them greatly ſuperior to their antagoniſts. The intereſts of England were likewiſe to be abandoned, and the dominion ſhe had ever injoyed over Ireland, ſince the conqueſt of that kingdom, was to be in a manner quite forfeited: nay, he was in danger, by ſuch a procedure, to loſe many friends in England. They who were ſincerely attached to him, and perſuaded that he acted upon motives of juſtice and religion, muſt have opened their eyes, had they ſeen him manifeſtly betray the intereſt of England, and the Proteſtant religion, by concluding with the Iriſh ſuch a peace as they demanded. Theſe were great difficulties which could only be ſurmounted by one of theſe methods: either by perſuading the Iriſh to rely on his general promiſes, that he would content them at a better juncture, and when it was more in his power; or elſe, coloring, with ſome ſpecious pretenſe, the favors he ſhould be obliged to grant them for a peace. With regard to the firſt of theſe methods, his Majeſty forgot nothing he judged apt to induce the Iriſh to truſt to his promiſes, and herein the marquis of Ormond was long imployed, without any effect: the Iriſh were immoveable, and would not be ſatisfied with words only. The ſecond method was ſtill more impracticable: for what color could be put upon his intire relinquiſhing both religion's and England's intereſts?

Charles I An' 1645.

Mean while, as this Prince was in hopes that, with the ſuccors from Ireland, he ſhould be able to give law to the parliament, and then not be obliged to uſe any farther ceremony, he reſolved not to deprive himſelf of ſuch a ſingular advantage, but to grant the Iriſh whatever they demanded. Nevertheleſs, to avoid the prejudice ſuch a procedure might create him in England, he choſe to conclude a private peace with the Iriſh, without ſolemnity, or the intervention of the lord-lieutenant, and bind himſelf to have it effectually executed, 'till it ſhould be in his power to ratify it ſolemnly; wherewith the Iriſh were content.

To this purpoſe, while the marquis of Ormond was ſeemingly laboring, with great earneſtneſs, to make a peace with the rebels, by trying to perſuade them to deſiſt from part of their demands, the earl of Glamorgan, authoriſed by his Majeſty, was treating with them ſecretly, and more effectually. He granted them, on the King's behalf, all their demands, on condition they would furniſh him with ten thouſand men, who ſhould paſs into England, under the ſaid earl of Glamorgan's conduct. But as this earl's bare promiſe was not a ſufficient ſecurity for the Iriſh, King Charles ſent him full powers, viz.

CHARLES R.

Ruſhworth. Vol. VI. p. 239, 240, 243.

"CHARLES by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, King Defender of the Faith, &c. To our truſty, and and right well-beloved couſin, Edward earl of Glamorgan, greeting. We, repoſing great and eſpecial truſt and confidence in your approved wiſdom and fidelity, do, by theſe (as firmly as under our great-ſeal, to all intents and purpoſes) authoriſe, and give you power, to treat and conclude with the confederate Roman-Catholics in our kingdom of Ireland, if upon neceſſity any be to be condeſcended unto, wherein our lieutenant cannot ſo well be ſeen, as not fit for us, at the preſent, publicly to own. Therefore we charge you to proceed according to this warrant, with all poſſible ſecreſy; and for whatſoever you ſhall ingage yourſelf, upon ſuch valuable conſiderations, as you in your judgment ſhall deem fit, we promiſe, on the word of a King, and a Chriſtian, to ratify and perform the ſame which ſhall be granted by you, and under your hand and ſeal; the ſaid confederate

" Catholics

Charles I An' 1645.

" Catholics having, by their ſupplies, teſtified their " zeal to our ſervice. And this ſhall be, in each " particular, to you a ſufficient warrant."

Given at our court at Oxford, under our ſignet, and royal ſignature, the twentieth day of March, in the twentieth year of our reign, 1644.

Remark. The date of this warrant is remarkable; for it was at a juncture when King Charles's affairs did not ſeem abſolutely to require his imploying the Iriſh Papiſts. In the preceding campain he had gained a ſignal advantage over the earl of Eſſex, with all the Weſtern counties. He had fought a battle at Newbury, which had not procured his enemies any real advantage, and had contrariwiſe, in the affairs of Dennington, manifeſted his belief of not having had any reaſon to fear them. It was juſt after the treaty of Uxbridge, where he did not think himſelf under a neceſſity of making any conceſſions. In a word, it was at a time when the parliament, by reaſon of the indifferent ſucceſs of their arms, were laboring to new-model their army. It cannot therefore be ſaid, that his Majeſty was driven by deſpair to have recourſe to the Iriſh for aſſiſtance. We may rather very readily perceive, it was ſolely to augment the ſuperiority he then had over the parliament.

By virtue of this warrant, the earl of Glamorgan concluded a treaty with the Popiſh biſhops, touching eccleſiaſtical benefices. This was a preliminary treaty, whereon thoſe prelates made the inſuing inſtruments: viz.

" Whereas, in theſe articles touching the clergy-" livings, the right honorable the earl of Glamor-" gan is obliged, in his Majeſty's behalf, to ſe-" cure the conceſſions in theſe articles by act of " parliament: We, holding that manner of ſe-" curing thoſe grants, as to the clergy-livings, to " prove more difficult and prejudicial to his Ma-" jeſty than, by doing thereof, and ſecuring thoſe " conceſſions otherwiſe, as to the ſaid livings, " the ſaid earl undertaking and promiſing, in " the behalf of his Majeſty, his heirs and ſuc-" ceſſors, as hereby he doth undertake to ſetle the " ſaid conceſſions, and ſecure them to the clergy, " and their reſpective ſucceſſors, in another ſecure " way, other than by parliament, at preſent; 'till " a fit opportunity be offered for ſecuring the " ſame, do agree, and condeſcend thereunto: and " this inſtrument, by his lordſhip ſigned, was before " the perfecting thereof intended to that purpoſe as " to the ſaid livings, to which purpoſe we mutually " ſigned this indorſement. And it is farther intended, " that the Catholic clergy ſhall not be interrupted " by parliament, or otherwiſe, as to the ſaid livings, " contrary to the meaning of theſe articles."

GLAMORGAN.

The earl likewiſe annexed the ſubſequent oath, or proteſtation: viz.

* Somerſet. " I Edward, * earl of Glamorgan, do proteſt " and ſwear, faithfully to acquaint the King's moſt " excellent Majeſty with the proceedings of this " kingdom, in order to his ſervice, and to the " indearment of this nation, and punctual per-" formance of what I have (as authoriſed by his " Majeſty) obliged myſelf to ſee performed; " and in default, not to permit the army intruſted " to my charge to adventure itſelf, or any con-" ſiderable part thereof, until conditions from his " Majeſty, and by his Majeſty be performed."

Sept. 3. 1645. GLAMORGAN.

Subſtance of the treaty between the earl of Glamorgan, and the confederate Iriſh Catholics.

Charles I An' 1645.

IT was ſaid, in the begining of the treaty, that much time had been imployed in meetings and debates betwixt James marquis of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and the commiſſioners of the Catholic council of Kilkenny, for the treating and concluding a peace; and thereupon many difficulties ariſing, the earl of Glamorgan was intruſted and authoriſed by his Majeſty, to grant and aſſure to the ſaid confederate Catholics farther grace and favors, which the ſaid lord-lieutenant had not as yet, in that latitude as they expected, granted unto them. In purſuance therefore of his Majeſty's authority, under his ſignature royal and ſignet, bearing date, at Oxon, the twelfth day of March, in the twentieth year of his Majeſty's reign.—" It is accorded and agreed, between the " ſaid earl of Glamorgan, for and on the behalf " of his Majeſty, and Richard lord viſcount " Mountgarret, preſident of the ſupreme council " at Kilkenny, Donnough lord viſcount Muſkerry, " &c. commiſſioners appointed by the confederate " Roman Catholics:

" I. That all the profeſſors of the Roman " Catholic religion in Ireland ſhall injoy the free " and public uſe and exerciſe of their religion.

" II. That they ſhall hold and injoy all the " churches by them injoyed within that kingdom, " or by them poſſeſſed at any time, ſince the " twenty-third of October, 1641, and all other " churches in the ſaid kingdom, other than ſuch " as are now actually injoyed by his Majeſty's " Proteſtant ſubjects.

" III. That all Roman Catholics ſhall be ex-" empted from the juriſdiction of the Proteſtant " clergy, and that the Roman Catholic clergy " ſhall not be puniſhed or moleſted for the exer-" ciſe of their juriſdiction over their reſpective " Catholic flocks.

" IV. That the following act ſhall be paſſed in " the next parliament to be holden in Ireland. [Here is inſerted the form of an act for ſecuring all his Majeſty's conceſſions to the Catholics.]

" V. That the marquis of Ormond, or any " others, ſhall not diſturb the profeſſors of the " Roman Catholic religion in the poſſeſſion of the " articles above ſpecified.

" VI. The earl of Glamorgan ingages his Ma-" jeſty's word for the performance of theſe articles.

" VII. The public faith of the kingdom ſhall " be ingaged unto the ſaid earl by the commiſ-" ſioners of the confederate Catholics, for ſending " ten thouſand men, by order of the general aſ-" ſembly at Kilkenny, armed one half with muſ-" quets, and the other half with pikes, to ſerve his " Majeſty in England, Wales, or Scotland, un-" der command of the earl of Glamorgan."

Signed the twenty-fifth of Auguſt, 1645.

Moreover, the Iriſh commiſſioners ingaged their word, and the faith of the ſupreme council of Kilkenny, that two thirds of the clergy's revenues ſhould be imployed, for the ſpace of three years, towards the maintenance of thoſe ten thouſand men, the other third being reſerved for the eccleſiaſtics ſubſiſtence.

This treaty, tho' made very ſecretly, was however diſcovered by a very extraordinary accident. The archbiſhop of Tuam, preſident of Connaught, going to Ulſter about ſome affairs, met with a body of Iriſh troops marching to beſiege Sligo, whom, whether for ſecurity ſake, or ſome other deſign, he joined. garison made a sally, charged the troops which were come to form the siege, utterly routed them, and killed the said archbishop. In his pockets were found, attested and signed by several bishops, authentic copies of the fore-mentioned treaty, and of Charles's warrant to the earl of Glamorgan, all which were remited over to the English parliament.

Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 240. Ludlow. Vol. I. p. 163.

The marquis of Ormond, lord Digby (then in Ireland) and some others, having soon heard that the secret was discovered, found no better expedient to clear his Majesty than to arrest Glamorgan, for having, in a presumptuous manner worthy of severe punishment, exceeded his orders, and concluded a treaty with the Irish. This is what King Charles also insinuated in his message to both houses, of the nineteenth of January, 1645-6.

Vol. VI. p. 246, 249.

Rushworth in his collections has inserted two intercepted letters of the earl of Glamorgan, one to his countess, dated in January, acquainting her that his imprisonment gave him not much uneasiness. In the other, of the twenty-sixth of February, directed to his Majesty, he told him, that he was at Waterford, providing ships to transport six thousand foot immediately, and that four thousand more were to follow them by May (1). However these troops never came to England; probably by reason of the change in his Majesty's affairs, which were in a very bad posture after the battle of Naseby. All his towns were taken one after another. The Scots were now before Newark, and general Fairfax, having reduced all the West to the parliament's obedience, was preparing to besiege the King in Oxford.

The French court sends Montreuil over to London. Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 577.

King Charles being in this melancholy situation, the court of France sent Montreuil into England, under pretext of making peace between King and parliament: but their real intention was, that Montreuil should indeavor to get a private agreement between his said Majesty and the Scots (2). This could not be effected without Charles's utterly abandoning the bishops, and consenting to the establishment of Presbytery in England. The court of France, and the Queen of England, hoped this project would succeed with greater facility, as it was agreeable to good policy, and the King's interests. That Prince would thereby have gained, not only the Scots, who had a strong army in England, but likewise the city of London, and the majority of parliament-members, who, generally speaking, insisted on the other points in dispute, only to obtain this the more easily. This was properly the sole means of balancing or surmounting the great power of the Independents, who were in a manner omnipotent in the army. Had King Charles taken this course, it would indisputably have turned greatly to his advantage: whereas, at the time it was proposed to him, he was absolutely destitute of all remedy: but his zeal for episcopacy would not suffer him to accept any such overture, and he told Montreuil, he would never consent to it. About the same time, his Queen sent over sir William Davenant, to persuade her royal consort to join with the Presbyterians, as the sole means of freeing himself from his calamitous condition. The moment Davenant offered to speak, he commanded him to be silent, and never more appear in his presense.

He counsels King Charles to join the Presbyterians.

His Majesty rejects the proposal. p. 579, 580. and Vol. III. p. 24.

Mean while Montreuil, being at his arrival in England possessed with a notion, that King Charles would not refuse the course which was to be proposed to him, had made some overtures to the Scotish commissioners residing in London, and found them inclinable to treat with his said Majesty: but after he had several times spoken and written to his Majesty, he found him immoveable. The Scots, on their part, being no less inflexible, constantly refused promising that Prince any kind of assistance, except he consented to the abolition of episcopacy. (3)

Montreuil's negociation between King Charles and the Scots. Idem, Vol. II. p. 579, 580.

While the affair was delayed by this difficulty, and Montreuil gone to the Scotish army before Newark, to labor for some medium favorable to Charles, Fairfax was advancing with his army, so that his Majesty was in danger of being inclosed in Oxford. This Prince's chief concern then was, to deliver himself from this imminent danger. Tho' he had 'till that very instant demurred upon going to the Scotish army, on account of the above difficulty, he saw however no other remedy when the danger approached. The Scotish officers had made him some general promises, seemingly founded on their hopes of his final consenting to their demands. He notified to them his intention of repairing to their army, and they promised to receive him and provide for his safety. Doubtless, he had not time to make a more particular treaty: at least, it is not to this day known, upon what terms King Charles put himself into the Scots hands, nor on what conditions they received him. Howsoever it was, his Majesty, not having a moment to spare, did, in order to avoid being shut up in Oxford, depart privately, and got to the Scotish army, the fifteenth of May, 1646 (4).

This Prince had, on the thirteenth of April, imparted to the marquis of Ormond his design of throwing himself into the arms of the Scots, by a letter containing these words: "Having lately "received very good security, that we, and all "who do, or shall adhere to us, shall be safe "in our persons, honors and consciences in the "Scotish army; and that they shall really "and effectually join with us, and with such as "will come in to us, and shall imploy their armies "and forces to assist us to the procuring of a happy "and well grounded peace —— If it shall please

(1) See in Rushworth (Vol. VI. p. 104.) the manner how this letter to the King, with lord Digby's narrative of his proceedings against the earl of Glamorgan, &c. came to the parliament's hands. —— This discovery proved extremely detrimental to his Majesty's affairs.

(2) Lord Clarendon (Vol. II. p. 579.) affirms, that the Scots were under terrible apprehensions of being disappointed of all their hopes, by the prevalence of the Independent army, and therefore wished for nothing more than opportunity to make a firm conjunction with the King.

(3) The Scots produced a writing, signed by the Queen, wherein were such expressions as did not please the King, and made him look upon that negociation, as rather a conspiracy against the church, between the Catholics and Presbyterians, than as an expedient for his restoration or preservation. Clarendon, ubi supra.

(4) According to lord Clarendon (Vol. III. p. 17.) the King was not resolved, when he left Oxford, whether he should go to London, or the Scots army. He says, the King went away the twenty seventh of April, attended only by John Ashburnham, groom of his bed chamber, and one mr. Hudson, a divine, who understood the by-ways. It was nine days after his leaving Oxford before it was known where the King was. It seems, the King had wasted that time in several places, purposely to be informed of the condition of the marquis of Montrose, and to find a secure passage to get to him, which he exceedingly desired. — Hudson, upon his examination, said, that the King crossed the country, was at Henley, Brentford, and Harrow on the Hill, where he stayed some time, and was almost persuaded to come to London; and then he went to St. Albans, and so to Harborough, in Leicestershire, where the French agent was to have met him, with some horse, to conduct him to the Scots army, but came not; from thence the King went to Stamford, where he lay one night; and from thence to Downham, in Norfolk, where he stayed at a petty ale-house, from April the thirtieth, to May the fourth; that he passed sometimes by the name of Hudson's tutor, sometimes doctor, and sometimes as Ashburnham's servant. Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 272.

Ormond ſent a copy of this letter to general Monroe, who commanded the Scots troops in Ireland, and Monroe communicated the ſame to the commiſſioners of the parliament in Ulſter, by whom copies of the letter, as printed at Dublin, were ſent over to both houſes, and it was read in the houſe of commons, on Saturday, June the ninth. Hereupon, on the inſuing Monday, the Scotiſh commiſſioners delivered a declaration to the houſe of peers, poſitively denying, that their army had made with the King any treaty to aſſiſt him. Thus we ſee, on one ſide, King Charles affirming he had received very good ſecurity that the Scots would declare for him; and, on the other, the commiſſioners of Scotland denying that their army had made any treaty with that Prince to aſſiſt him.

Very ſeemingly, the Scotiſh commiſſioners, and the general-officers of their army, had given Montreuil hope they would declare for the King, but on condition he would renounce epiſcopacy; without which condition it is not eaſy to conceive that thoſe commiſſioners or officers ſhould have made ſuch a promiſe, which was not in their power; ſince they could not ingage contrary to the expreſs tenor of the covenant, and without poſitive orders from thoſe who governed Scotland. Wherefore it muſt have been only hopes, and thoſe conditional, which King Charles prepoſterouſly took for aſſurances, and which poſſibly Montreuil, as well as he, had ſo confounded. It is true, lord Clarendon cites a paper ſigned by Montreuil, wherein he ſays, " I do pro- " miſe, in the name of the King and Queen (my " maſter and miſtreſs) and by virtue of the powers " I have from their Majeſties, That if the King of " of Great-Britain ſhall put himſelf into the Scotiſh " army, he ſhall be there received as their natural " Sovereign, and ſhall be with them in all freedom of " his conſcience and honor.——And that the Scots " ſhall imploy their armies and forces to aſſiſt his " Majeſty in the recovery of his juſt rights, &c.".

But it muſt be obſerved, there is not in this paper a ſingle word to prove Montreuil's being impowered to make this promiſe, either by the commiſſioners, or the general-officers, or the parliament of Scotland: nay, it does not ſo much as appear that he was accepted for mediator in this affair; that beſide, he could not ingage the authority of the King and Queen-regent of France to make ſuch a promiſe, except he was furniſhed with a treaty, which however has never appeared. The above-cited noble hiſtorian intimates, that Montreuil had the word of the principal officers of the Scotiſh army, but that afterwards, finding them grown cold, he wrote to his Majeſty, diſſuading him from venturing his perſon among them. In reality, it is hard to conceive how Montreuil ſhould ſign ſuch a promiſe without being authoriſed. But, contrariwiſe, is it likely that, if he had been authoriſed by a treaty, or other warrant, he would not have mentioned it in his paper?

But what ſeems ſtill more impoſſible is, that the Scots ſhould promiſe without condition, as this ingagement intimates, contrary to the tenor of the covenant between the two nations, ſince King Charles would not ever hear ſpeak of aboliſhing epiſcopacy. There muſt therefore have been ſome miſtake in the negociation carried on by Montreuil's mediation, and both King and mediator muſt have taken for poſitive aſſurances, promiſes which were conditional only, as appears in Charles's letter to the marquis of Ormond, and the Scots ſolemn denial. Howſoever this be, Montreuil was recalled and diſgraced, and, as there is reaſon to believe, it was for ingaging the words and honors of the King his maſter, and the Queen-regent, upon ſo trifling a foundation. Lord Clarendon (poſſibly to prevent his royal maſter's being blamed for puting himſelf into the Scots hands too haſtily, and without good ſecurity) ſays, this envoy's diſgrace was an artifice of cardinal Mazarine, who had a mind to conceal the inſincerity of the court of France. I muſt confeſs, the meaning of theſe words ſurpaſſes my comprehenſion: but if it be fact, that Montreuil was not authoriſed to promiſe what he did, as it does not appear he was, I ſee not any occaſion to ſeek for other cauſe of his diſgrace.

King Charles being come to the Scotiſh army (1), which had been before Newark ever ſince November, the general repreſented to him, that it would be proper, for the ſafety of his perſon, for the army to march Northward, near the borders of Scotland: but as this could not be attempted, he ſaid, before Newark was reduced, he deſired him to order the town to ſurrender. His Majeſty, prevailed on by this reaſon, gave orders to lord Bellaſis, the governor, to ſurrender Newark, which was done accordingly; and immediately after the army began to march, and, with the King, arrived at Newcaſtle.

Concerning the militia, he agreed, that the two houſes ſhould, during ſeven years, nominate all the commiſſioners for that truſt, and after the expiration of that term, a regulation ſhould be made by the King and both houſes.

He offered the like for the kingdom of Scotland.

Concerning the wars in Ireland, he ſaid, in general, he would do whatever was poſſible for him to give full ſatisfaction therein.

In a poſtſcript, he offered to diſband his forces at Oxford, and conſent that the fortifications of that city ſhould be demoliſhed, provided honorable terms were granted to the gariſon; which done, he would give like orders to the reſt of his gariſons.

Next day, his Majeſty wrote to the city of London, acquainting them, that he was ready to comply with the parliament in every thing.

He writes to the city of London. Ibid.

June the tenth, he preſſed the two houſes by another meſſage, to ſend their propoſitions for peace, that he might give them all juſt ſatisfaction; and again deſired the liberty of repairing to London, and there treating with them perſonally (2).

The twenty-fifth ditto, the Scotish commissioners presented a memorial to the parliament, whereby they consented, that the propositions for peace, which had been communicated to them, should be sent to the King, with protestation however, that they were not all agreeable to their sentiments. They desired also, that money might be sent to their troops, both in England and Ireland; their accounts stated; and all armies speedily disbanded.

The Scots deny their having made any treaty with his Majesty. p. 303.

Mean while, the Scotish army at Newcastle, understanding its being reported at London, that they had made a treaty with his Majesty, to assist him against the parliament, published a declaration, protesting, it was always their intention to maintain the covenant between the two kingdoms, and that they abhorred all public and private ways tending to violate the same, or to create a misunderstanding between the two nations. At the same time, they presented a petition to the King, beseeching him to take a speedy course for setling religion in England, according to the example of the best reformed churches, and for establishing the privileges and liberties of his kingdoms: expressing their great grief for his not having yet authorised and signed the covenant (1). They also prayed him to comply with the counsels of his parliament. To this petition Charles returned a general answer, without entering into particulars.

June 18. p. 306---308.

The general-assembly of the Scotish kirk wrote likewise to the parliament of England, the city of London and assembly of divines, to desire them to promote the work of reformation, according to the tenor of the covenant.

The Scotish army voted no longer necessary. p. 306, 309. Whitelock, p. 215.

July six, the house of commons voted, that England had no farther need of the Scotish army, and that the commissioners of Scotland should be desired to withdraw their forces.

Some days after, the two houses sent (2) propositions for peace to his Majesty, at Newcastle, which were little different from those debated at Uxbridge, and wherefore I think it not necessary to repeat them. I shall content myself with citing the thirteenth article, being a new addition to the former claims of both houses concerning the militia:

Propositions of the two houses to his Majesty. July 11. Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 311.

"That, during the space of twenty years, the "two houses of parliament alone shall have power "to arm, train and discipline the militia; and "that neither the King, nor his successors, shall, "during the said space of twenty years, exercise "any power over them.

"The like for the kingdom of Scotland, if the "estates of the parliament there shall think fit.

"That monies be raised for the maintenance of "the said forces for land-service, and of the navy, "as the lords and commons shall, during the said "space of twenty years, think fit; and that the "said forces be imployed, ordered and disposed as "the two houses shall appoint, and not otherwise: "that they shall have power, 1. To suppress all "forces raised without their authority and consent. "2. To suppress all foreign forces, who shall invade "any of the English dominions. 3. To conjoin "the forces of England with those of Scotland.

"That, after the expiration of the said twenty "years, no person, under any pretense whatsoever, "shall any way dispose of the English forces, with-"out consent of both houses.

"That, after the said twenty years, if any bills "are passed by the lords and commons, for the "safety of the kingdom, and the royal assent is "not given to them within such time as the house "of peers shall judge convenient; that such bills "shall nevertheless be as valid, to all intents and "purposes, as if the royal assent had been given "thereunto."

Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 319.

The parliament's commissioners presented these propositions to his Majesty, on the twenty-fourth of July, and, as they declared to him, were limited not to stay above ten days at Newcastle; Charles gave them his answer, on the first of August, viz.

His answer. p. 320. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 27.

"That the propositions tendered to him did "import so great alterations in government, both "in the church and kingdom, that it was very dif-"ficult for him to return a particular and positive "answer to them, before a full debate, wherein "those propositions, and the necessary explanation, "true sense and reasons thereof, were rightly "weighed and understood; which he found the "commissioners were not authorised to admit, nor "able to give him. That he desired to come to "London with freedom, honor and safety, where "he might have those doubts cleared, and those "difficulties explained to him." Farther assuring them: "That, as he could never condescend to "what was absolutely destructive to that just "power which, by the laws of God and the land, "he was born unto, so he would chearfully grant "and give his assent to all such bills as should "be really for the good and peace of his people, "not having regard to his own in particular."

The Scots press him to accept those propositions. p. 28. Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 319. Whitelock, Before King Charles delivered his answer to the parliament's commissioners, the earl of Loudon, lord-chancellor of Scotland, made a speech, persuading him to accept the propositions. His reasons were the stronger and more pressing, as drawn from the necessity his Majesty lay under. But Charles thought not proper to take his advice. This answer, being read in parliament, the twelfth of August, occasioned excessive joy to those who wished not for peace (3).

The Scotish army offer to return home. Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 322.

This same day, the Scotish commissioners presented to the peers a memorial, offering to send their army into Scotland, on reasonable satisfaction for their pains, hazards, charges and sufferings. They also said, since his Majesty had not agreed to the propositions presented him, it was necessary to consult with them what was to be done, as well concerning the King's person, as the peace and safety of the two kingdoms. Both houses returned them thanks, and appointed a commitee to examine their accounts.

Disputes concerning arrears due to the Scots. p. 323---326. Ludlow. Vol. I. p. 174. Holles's Mem. p. 64, 66. Whitelock,

The account of the arrears, which they delivered in some days after, amounted to two millions. The parliament disputed several articles, and deducted such sums as had been already paid. The Scots allowed the justice of some of these deductions,

(2) By the earls of Pembroke and Suffolk, with four commoners. See Whitelock, p. 214.

(3) A little after the King's coming to Newcastle, a Scotish minister preached boldly before; him and when his sermon was done, called for the fifty-second Psalm, which begins, "Why doest thou, tyrant, boast thyself, thy wicked works to "praise." Whereupon his Majesty stood up, and called for the fifty-sixth Psalm, which begins, "Have mercy, Lord, on me "I pray, for men will me devour." The people waved the minister's Psalm, and sung that which the King called for. Whitelock, p. 230.——While the King was at Newcastle, Henderson came and much importuned his Majesty, to pass the propositions; but his Majesty affirming, he could not in conscience consent to several things therein, especially to the change of church-government, from the ancient order of episcopacy, several papers passed between his Majesty and him, which shewed the King's great abilities in those controversies, being at a time when he could not have the assistance of any of his chaplains. Henderson returning to Edinburg, died soon after, on August 31. He was, says Whitelock, a person of a sober conversation and good learning. This writer (p. 221.) adds, "some said he died of grief, because he could not persuade the King to "sign the propositions." He was more moderate, says Rushworth (Vol. VI. p. 321.) than many of them.

but could not agree to others (1). Finally, after many debates, the Scots offered to accept of a ſum in groſs, for a full diſcharge of their arrears. Hereupon they were aſked, what ſum they demanded; and at firſt they inſiſted on five hundred thouſand pounds. The houſe of commons offered two hundred, and afterwards three hundred thouſand pounds. At length the Scots abating a hundred thouſand pounds of their demand, it was agreed to allow them four hundred thouſand, half whereof they were to receive on their leaving England, and the reſidue at certain ſpecified times. This is the fatal bargain, whereby it is pretended, the Scots ſold King Charles to the parliament of England, becauſe indeed they delivered him up ſome months after: but it muſt be obſerved, that this is only a ſuſpicion, a bare conjecture; and, if be true that the Scots, when they agreed on this ſum of four hundred thouſand pounds, obliged themſelves to give up the King, which I will neither affirm nor deny, they at leaſt acted with ſo much addreſs, that there appeared no expreſs proof of it. No treaty, no paper concerning this affair, ever reached the public's knowledge. This ſum was promiſed them for arrears due to their army, from the eighteenth of January 1643-4, to the eighteenth of September 1646. If it could be proved that, in all that time, the Scotiſh army had been regularly paid, according to the treaty between both nations, and that no arrears were due to them, this would, unanſwerably, be a confirmation of the ſaid ſurmiſe. But this proof is very difficult: for if, on one ſide, the Scots, to mount the debt to five hundred thouſand pounds, inſerted in their accounts ſeveral unjuſt articles, which ought to have been abated, the Engliſh, on their ſide, acted with no leſs injuſtice, in offering to make unfair deductions. This appears by the particulars of accounts brought in by both parties, which are to be ſeen in Ruſhworth's collections. Nay, had the Engliſh been deſirous to conceal the ſecret motive of this bargain, they certainly ſhould not have diſputed the debt, ſince nothing would have been properer to remove the ſuſpicion of their giving the Scots this ſum to ingage them to deliver up the King, than manifeſting the ſame to have been really due to them for arrears.

Agreed to allow them 400,000 l.

Ruſhworth, Vol, VI. p. 323, 324, 326.

Another remark.

Another, and no leſs important remark may be made on this ſubject. What has rendered deteſtable this pretended ſale of King Charles's perſon, is that Prince's tragical cataſtrophe, whereof it was the occaſion: but it muſt be conſidered as having been ſo only by accident. Nothing was at that time farther from the thoughts both of parliament and Scots, than taking away the King's life. The Independents, mortal enemies to King, Scots and Preſbyterians, where the men who, by means of the army, twice took away his Majeſty from the parliament, and cut off his head, at the very inſtant when both parliament and Scots were heartily laboring to reſtore him, as will appear in the ſequel. If therefore this imaginary ſale, ſuppoſing it real, was the occaſion of King Charles's death, we may affirm it was innocently ſo, and its effects ought not to be imputed to the parliament, ſuch as it then was; ſince it is certain, neither both houſes, nor Scots, did at that time carry their views ſo far, nor could poſſibly foreſee what afterwards happened: but, as I obſerved, it cannot any how be proved, that the Scots did indeed ſell King Charles to the Engliſh. We ſhall immediately be brought acquainted with the reaſons why the Scots would not take charge of his Majeſty's perſon.

Early in September, duke Hamilton, who had been releaſed out of Michael's-Mount caſtle, in Cornwal, upon the parliament's taking that place, came to Newcaſtle, with ſome other Scotiſh commiſſioners, and earneſtly preſſed the King to accept the propoſitions for peace. Had the Scots, by a ſecret treaty, bargained to give up this Prince to the parliament, ſuch a procedure ſeems acting to their own detriment; ſince his compliance would have voided their bargain with the Engliſh, and deprived them of the ſtipulated reward.

CHARLES I AN' 1646.

Hamilton preſſes his Majeſty to yield to the propoſitions. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 327. Burnet's Mem. Ham. p. 285.

His Majeſty by way of replication told the duke, and his collegues, "That he only deſired to be "heard, but could not obtain his deſire. That "he did not give a denial to the propoſitions, but "only deſired to be rightly informed of what was "demanded, and that his reaſons might be heard."

Charles's anſwer. Ruſhworth, ubi ſupra.

In another anſwer, given them next day in writing, he ſaid, "He ſhould be content to reſtrain "epiſcopal government to ſome few dioceſes, as "Oxford, Wincheſter, Briſtol, Bath and Wells, "and Exeter; leaving all the reſt of England fully "to the Preſbyterian government, with the ſtricteſt "clauſes they ſhould think upon againſt Papiſts "and Independents." In a poſtcript, he required them, "to give a particular account of this offer "to the general-aſſembly in Scotland; aſſuring "them, that he would punctually make good his "laſt letter to them: and hoped, that they, as "church-men, would not preſs him to comply with "what was againſt his conſcience, 'till he ſhould "have leiſure to be better informed."

p. 328. Burnet's Mem. p. 285, 286.

This reply was a plain intimation that, when the King ſaid he deſired 'to be heard,' it was only a pretenſe to have liberty of repairing to London, and there geting, if poſſible, the propoſitions altered. We ſee alſo by this anſwer, that he conſidered the affair of church-government as the principal and moſt difficult point. In a word, his offer ſhews he was very hard preſſed, ſince he agreed that Preſbytery ſhould be eſtabliſhed throughout the whole realm, excepting only ſome dioceſes.

Some time after, he ſent duke Hamilton a letter, telling him, that the two houſes thought of geting him into their hands, by ſaying, they did not intend to make him a priſoner, but only to give him an honorable guard; but, for his part, he would not be left in England, when the Scotiſh army retired, without a viſible force upon his perſon. Probably therefore, when he demanded leave for going to London to treat in perſon with both houſes, he meaned, that he ſhould be left at perfect liberty (2). Perhaps, he deſigned to eſcape into France, or elſewhere. But how could he imagine, he ſhould be left at perfect liberty, on the bare preſumption that a negociation with him would be ſucceſsful?

Conferences about diſpoſing the King's perſon. Octob. 1. Ibid.

At laſt, on the eighteenth of September, it was voted, that the King's perſon ſhould be diſpoſed of as both houſes of parliament thought proper: but as he was not actually in their power, they appointed a commitee to confer thereon with the Scotiſh commiſſioners.

In one of theſe conferences, lord Loudon, chancellor of Scotland, indeavored to ſhew, that one of the two kingdoms had no more right than the other to diſpoſe of the King's perſon, becauſe he was equally King of both, and that moreover they were united in the ſame intereſt by their covenant. The Engliſh commiſſioners replied, That the King being in England, it belonged to the Engliſh to diſpoſe of his perſon; and tho' he had retired to the Octob. 6.

Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 331.

"That the diſpoſing of his Majeſty's perſon "did belong to both kingdoms, and therefore, "that he ought not to be diſpoſed of by any "one of the kingdoms, but by joint advice of "both." He explained the word 'diſpoſe,' which was liable to be miſunderſtood: and ſaid; "He "meaned thereby, either that his Majeſty ſhould "be put under reſtraint, or be at freedom with "honor and ſafety. As for the way of reſtraint "he ſaid, he looked upon it as a remedy more "dangerous than the diſeaſe, and as a means to "draw the war of foreign Kings upon the nation, "(eſpecially the Prince being in other kingdoms) "rather than to quiet the troubles at home. And "therefore he concluded, that he would lay aſide "the way of reſtraint, and ſpeak of the way "which might be with freedom, honor and ſafety; "and that could be no other, but that his Ma"jeſty ſhould go into Scotland, or come to his "parliament, or ſome of his houſes about Lon"don. His going into Scotland, he obſerved, "was full of danger and inconvenience to both "kingdoms: for the Iriſh, banded with a crew "of malignants, poſſeſſed the mountains and high"lands, which were the ſtrong-holds, and never "conquered parts of that kingdom: that they "had not laid down their arms, but kept in a "body together; and they were ſo near Ireland, "as the forces of the rebels there might in two "or three hours ſpace come over and join with "them; and Scotland not being able to keep "and entertain armies long, the King being there "might raiſe ſuch forces in that kingdom, as "might make way quickly into England: and "therefore his Majeſty's going into Scotland "being of moſt dangerous conſequence to both "kingdoms, he offered to their lordſhips conſi"deration for his Majeſty's coming to London, or "ſome of his houſes thereabouts." The principal reaſon whereon he grounded his opinion, was the ſame which Charles himſelf had alleged. "That "he had not refuſed his aſſent to the propoſitions, "but only deſired to have his doubts cleared, and "difficulties explained."

But there was in this reaſoning a material defect, which muſt have been viſible to all: and that is, the chancellor ſuppoſed, that his Majeſty ſhould not be put under any reſtraint, but left at full liberty in Scotland, at London, or ſome of his houſes; which certainly was very far from the thoughts of him who ſpake of the Scots, and of the Engliſh parliament. Lord Loudon therefore, in building on ſo bad a foundation, could not expect his reaſoning ſhould be conſidered as of much weight, had he not been to deal with men whoſe intereſt it was to feign they thought it very ſolid.

Nothing ſeems apter to confirm the ſuſpicion of the Scots being ingaged to deliver up King Charles to the parliament, than this artifice of lord Loudon: for, tho' he ſuppoſed, his Majeſty would be in one of his houſes with honor and ſafety, he knew the contrary, and that the parliament would be maſter of his perſon. Conſequently it was the very ſame as delivering him to the parliament, the condition that he ſhould be there with honor and ſafety being only dazzling terms, to which both houſes might always give what ſenſe they pleaſed. But this muſt be conſidered not as a real proof, but a bare conjecture, which even ſeems to be deſtroyed by what ſoon after occurred. The commiſſioners of Scotland having got printed a narrative of what paſſed at theſe conferences, with the ſpeeches to prove that England had no more right than Scotland to diſpoſe of the King's perſon, the commons were thereat ſo highly offended, that they ordered all the copies to be ſeized, and the printer impriſoned. They alſo drew up a long anſwer to the Scots account, and ſent it to the Scotiſh commiſſioners, who refuſed receiving it, as coming only from one of the two houſes; but the commons had it printed and publiſhed. If it be true that the Scots had ingaged to ſurrender his Majeſty to the parliament for the ſum of four hundred thouſand pounds, nothing was more prepoſterous than this diſpute, which was attended with great acrimony, except it be ſuppoſed, that both houſes and the Scotiſh commiſſioners had concerted to act this ſort of farce.

CHARLES I An' 1646.

Whitelock. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 336.

This diſpute, real or feigned, obſtructed not the Scotiſh army's preparations to return home. But as they were to touch the two hundred thouſand pounds, before their march began, they might have continned ſtill ſeveral weeks in England, had not the city of London ingaged to advance that ſum. It was however upon two conditions: 1. That the lenders ſhould have 8 l. per cent. intereſt for their money: 2. That the payment of the principal ſhould be ſecured out of the receipts of the grand exciſe, and the ſale of biſhops lands (1). For this reaſon, both houſes made haſte to ſequeſter theſe lands, and appoint a commitee to expoſe them to ſale (2).

The tenth of December, the parliament of Scotland took into conſideration what was to be done with the King's perſon. After great debates, it was finally reſolved, that the commiſſioners reſiding at London ſhould, from the Scotiſh parliament, demand of both houſes; that the King might return to London with honor and ſafety: that they ſhould declare to them, that the parliament of Scotland was reſolved to ſupport monarchy in the perſon of King Charles, and his juſt title to the crown of England. This reſolution ſeems directly contrary to any ingagement to give up that Prince to the parliament.

But next day, the commiſſioners of the general-aſſembly preſented to the parliament a paper, intitled, 'A ſolemn and ſeaſonable Warning to all "Eſtates and Degrees of Perſons throughout the "Land;" wherein they repreſented the heinous crime of forſaking the covenant, and indeavoring a breach with England. They maintained, that ſuch projects were infuſed into ſome by the devil, and that they who attempted to ſow diviſion between the two nations, and violate the covenant, which was their chief ſtrength, could not but be enemies to the ſtate. Then, as to the diſpoſal of the King's perſon, they ſaid, that ſo long as his Majeſty did not approve in his heart, and ſeal with his hand, the league and covenant, he could not be received in Scotland without expoſing the kingdom to freſh troubles: that, on the other hand, to diſpoſe of the King's perſon without the parliament of England's conſent, was openly breaking the covenant, and incurring the guilt of perjury: that it was very true, they were ingaged by the covenant to defend the King's perſon; but it was no leſs true, that the end of the union between the two nations, was to ſetle religion in both kingdoms, according to the tenor of the covenant; and that theſe two ingagements could not be ſeparated: that for theſe reaſons, they deſired freſh indeavors might be uſed, to prevail with his Majeſty to give ſatisfaction to both kingdoms, that he might return to his parliament of England, as a reconciled Prince to ſatisfied ſubjects, in order to eſtabliſh a happy peace.

The parliament alter their reſolution. Whitelock, p. 390.

This paper being read in parliament, the matter was again taken into conſideration, and at length, after a ſtrong debate, it was reſolved, "That his "Majeſty ſhould be deſired to grant the whole "propoſitions; and, in caſe of refuſal, the certi"fications given to his Majeſty ſhould be put in "execution, namely, to ſecure the kingdom with"out him;" and it was declared, "That the "kingdom of Scotland cannot lawfully ingage "themſelves for his Majeſty; he not taking the "covenant, ſatisfying as to religion, &c. Charles's meſſage to both houſes for a perſonal treaty. Dec. 20. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. d. 393.

Charles, having notice of this reſolution, ſent a meſſage to both houſes at Weſtminſter, deſiring again to come to London, or any of his houſes thereabouts, upon the public faith and ſecurity of his parliament and the Scotiſh commiſſioners, that he ſhould be there with honor, freedom and ſafety, in order to have his doubts cleared, and difficulties explained: aſſuring them, that he would moſt willingly condeſcend to them in whatſoever ſhould be really for their good and happineſs; conjuring them to conſider it was their King who deſired to be heard, which if refuſed to a ſubject by a King, he would be therefore deemed a tyrant.

Upon this meſſage, the peers voted, that his Majeſty might come to Newmarket, there to remain with ſuch attendants about him as both houſes ſhould appoint: but the commons voted, that Holmby-houſe, in Northamptonſhire, would be the fiteſt place for him; whereto their lordſhips conſented. Then it was reſolved, "That his coming "to Holmby ſhould be with reſpect to the ſafety "and preſervation of his Majeſty's perſon, and in "defenſe of the true religion, according to the "covenant (2).

The fifth of January, 1646-7, a commitee of both houſes was appointed to go down and receive his Majeſty from the Scots (3). For tho' both houſes had declared his being at Holmby with honor and ſafety, they did not mean to leave the manner to his choice; and, whatever expreſſions they might uſe, it was to be in effect a real impriſonment.

Some days after, both houſes received from the parliament of Scotland this ſubſequent declaration: viz.

The Scotiſh parliament's declaration. Jan. 16. Ruſhworth. Vol. VI. p. 395.

"THAT the King's Majeſty came to their "quarters before Newark, and profeſſed he "came there with a full and abſolute intention to "give all juſt ſatisfaction to the joint deſires of both "kingdoms, and with no thought either to con"tinue this unnatural war any longer, or to make "diviſion betwixt the kingdoms; but to comply "with his parliaments, and thoſe intruſted by "them, in every thing for ſetling of truth and "peace; and that he would apply himſelf totally "to the counſels and advices of his parliament: "which he did not only profeſs verbally, to the "commitee of eſtates with the Scotiſh army, but "alſo, in his ſeveral letters and declarations under "his hand, to the commitee of eſtates of Scot"land, and to the two houſes of parliament of "England reſpectively. In confidence whereof, "and of the reality of his intentions and reſolu"tions, which he declared did proceed from no "other ground than the deep ſenſe of the bleed"ing condition of his kingdoms; the commitees "of the kingdom of Scotland, and general of"ficers of the Scotiſh army, declared to himſelf, "and to the kingdom of England, their receiving "his royal perſon to be on theſe terms (which is "truth, notwithſtanding what may be ſuggeſted "or alleged to the contrary, by any within or "without the kingdoms) and repreſented to him, "that the only way to his own happineſs and "peace of his kingdoms, under God, was to make "good his propoſitions of peace (which after ſe"rious and mature deliberation were agreed upon) "tendered to him, in the name of both his king"doms, for his royal aſſent thereunto; but alſo, "the chief judicatories of this kingdom, both "civil and eccleſiaſtical, made their humble and "earneſt addreſſes to his Majeſty, by ſupplica"tions, letters and commiſſioners for that end; "and did freely repreſent all the prejudices and "inconveniencies of the delay or refuſal of his "aſſent, and, in particular, that this kingdom "would be neceſſitated to join with the kingdom of "England, conform to the league and covenant, "in providing for the ſecurity of both kingdoms, "and ſetling the government of both, as might "conduce moſt to the good of both. And the "parliament of Scotland, being now to retire their "army out of England, have again, for their farther "exoneration, ſent commiſſioners, to repreſent "their renewed deſires to his Majeſty, with the "danger which might inſue by his delay, or re"fuſal to grant the ſame; and that, 'till then, "there was danger to the cauſe, to his Majeſty, "to this kingdom, and to the union betwixt both "kingdoms, by his coming to Scotland; and that, "therefore, there would be a joint courſe taken "by both the kingdoms, concerning the diſpoſal "of his perſon. And conſidering that his Ma"jeſty, by his anſwer to the propoſitions of "peace in Auguſt laſt, and alſo by his late meſ"ſage ſent to the two houſes, and by his warrant "communicated to the eſtates of this kingdom, "hath expreſſed his deſires to be near his two "houſes of parliament: and ſeeing alſo the parlia"ment of England have communicated to the "Scotiſh commiſſioners at Newcaſtle, and by "them to this kingdom, their reſolution, that "Holmby-houſe, in the county of Northampton, "is the place which the two houſes think fit for "the King to come unto, there to remain with "ſuch attendance about him as both houſes ſhall "appoint, with reſpect had to the ſafety and pre"ſervation of his royal perſon, in the preſerva"tion and defenſe of the true religion and liberties "of the kingdoms, according to the covenant.

Charles delivered to the commitee, and conducted to Holmby. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 398.

January the twenty-third, the parliament's commiſſioners came to Newcaſtle, and on the thirtieth ditto his Majeſty was delivered to them. That very day, the Scotiſh army began to march towards Scotland, and the King arrived at Holmby, the ſixteenth of February.

Preſbyterians and Independents begin to ſeparate.

Hitherto, the Preſbyterians and Independents had acted as in concert, becauſe it was equally advantageous to them, or rather neceſſary, that Charles ſhould be diſabled from hurting both. When that Prince was reduced to his then condition, in the hands of a parliament, conſiſting of two factions which had equally conſpired his ruin, theſe factions, which had 'till then ſeemed united, began to be openly divided, each plainly perceiving this was the critical juncture to make their own benefit of the advantages gained in common upon the vanquiſhed Sovereign. The Preſbyterians were ſuperior in the parliament, and in London: but the Independents were, as I may ſay, lords of the army, and thereby their faction was grown very conſiderable. The Preſbyterians grand affair was therefore to diſband the army, under color of its being unneceſſary, ſince the war was ended; and the Independents grand buſineſs was, to prevent this diſbanding, which could not but be fatal to their party. It is certain, the parliament, being almoſt wholly Preſbyterian ſeriouſly thought of diſcarding the Independents, and particularly the general officers of that faction. As they were obliged to ſend forces to Ireland, their project was to take for that ſervice, out of the foot, horſe and dragoons, ſuch as ſhould be willing to go thither, form them into companies, and give them officers in whom they could confide. After that, their intent was to diſband the whole reſidue of their army, retaining only as many as ſhould be neceſſary for the garriſons. Had this project ſucceeded, the Independent party would have been irrecoverably ruined: but the parliament had to deal with perſons too ſubtil to give them time to take all their meaſures. Oliver Cromwell, a man of uncommon reſolution, capacity, and profound diſſimulation, was then at the head of the Independents, tho' he ſtill affected paſſing for a ſtanch Preſbyterian. He frequented the Preſbyterians preachings with a ſeemingly extraordinary devotion. He, Preſbyterian-like, much uſed ſcripture-phraſes, and uttered not a word which might betray him to be Independent, either in perſuaſion or politics. In ſhort, he had found means to perſuade general Fairfax, that his ſole aim was to promote God's glory, religion's, and the kingdom's welfare. He had in the army a great number of officers, who acted merely by his directions; ſo that while he did all, he ſeemed to do nothing. Among theſe officers were his ſon-in-law Ireton, Rainſborough, Fleetwood, Lambert, Harriſon, with ſeveral others, who took care to ſtrengthen the Independent party, by means of many ſubalterns, who labored at gaining proſelytes among the ſoldiers, and were ſo many emiſſaries in every regiment. Cromwell was member of parliament (1), and withal lieutenant-general of the army, notwithſtanding the ſelf-denying ordinance, from which he had been exempted. After the war was over, he conſtantly attended the houſe, and thereby might be informed of the project againſt the army, or rather againſt the Independent party in general. He ſeemed to approve the meaſures deſigned by the commons, viz. of forming an army in Ireland (2), and diſbanding the other forces: but at the ſame time, by means of his emiſſaries, he raiſed in the army a ſpirit of diſcontent and mutiny. This was the more eaſy, as the officers and ſoldiers found themſelves on the point of being diſcarded, and as moſt were little able to reſume their quondam profeſſions, after four or five years paſſed in warfare. There were in the army many officers who, before the wars, had been only mean plebeans or mechanics, and ſaw with great regret they were going to be reduced, to quit their imploys which gave them authority, and return to their priſtine occupations, and be mixed as before with the populace. Theſe men, as well as thoſe gained by the Independents, were ready for any undertaking, to avoid being obliged to change a courſe of life they had now led for ſome years. Cromwell therefore, and the officers of his party, improving this diſpoſition, diligently inſpired the army with diſcontent againſt the two houſes, wherein they ſucceeded but too well (3).

The firſt ſpark of this flame appeared in March, 1647, juſt when the parliament thought very ſeriouſly of executing their above-hinted project. The commons had notice, that ſome officers of the army had prepared a petition, to be preſented to general Fairfax, and communicated in parliament. In this petition was deſcribed the unhappy condition moſt of the officers and ſoldiers would be in, when the army ſhould be diſbanded. The articles deſired were: " Indemnity for actions as " ſoldiers. Satisfaction for arrears. No preſſing " for horſe or foot. Relief of widows and " maimed ſoldiers. Pay 'till diſbanded." This petition flew from regiment to regiment, and certain officers appeared extremely diligent to procure ſubſcriptions. Hereupon the commons ſent general Fairfax orders to make ſtrict inquiry after the authors of this petition, and put a ſtop to the conferences held in the army to ſow diſcord and diviſion. His ſaid excellency replied, That, in obedience to the houſe's order, he had aſſembled the officers, and queſtioned them about the petition: that they had expreſſed a deep ſenſe of their unhappineſs, in being miſunderſtood in their clear intentions, which, as they had proteſted, were no other than, by way of petition, to repreſent to him, their general, thoſe inconveniences which would neceſſarily befal moſt of the army after diſbanding; but withal had aſſured him, they would wholly acquieſce in whatſoever he ſhould judge reaſonable to offer, or the houſe to grant, on their behalf. He added, That, for the houſe's better information, he had ſent lieutenant-general Hammond, colonel Hammond, colonel Lilburn, lieutenant-colonel Pride, and lieutenant-colonel Grimes, who, he hoped, would give a full and candid account of the whole matter.

Accordingly, theſe officers were examined before the houſe; after which, the ſpeaker, at their diſmiſſion, told them what ſenſe the houſes had of the petition, and deſired their care for ſuppreſſing this, or any other afterwards of a like nature (1). That very day, the houſe ordered Fairfax, to publiſh a declaration, at the head of every regiment, importing, that the petition tended to put the army into a mutiny, and obſtruct the relief of Ireland, and that the promoters thereof ſhould be proceeded againſt as enemies to the ſtate, and diſturbers of the public peace (2).

The army's diſcontent increaſes. Ibid.

The commons could not have taken a ſtep more agreeable to thoſe who had formed the project of ſowing diviſion between the parliament and army. This declaration gave the officers and ſoldiers occaſion to complain openly, "That they, who had "fought for the liberty of the ſubjects of England, "were denied the liberty of the ſubject to petition, "tho' it were to their general, and merely in "things relating to them as ſoldiers, meddling neither with church nor ſtate affairs, and withal, "ſubmiting it to the general's judgment, for approbation or correction, as he ſaw cauſe."

The parliament ſends a commitee to form the army for Ireland. p. 451, 452.

Mean while the two houſes, intending to execute their reſolution of ſending forces into Ireland, in the manner they had projected, appointed a commitee for that purpoſe, and gave them power to form the regiments of this army, and commiſſion ſuch officers as they ſhould judge proper. At the ſame time, they reſolved to incourage thoſe who voluntarily offered to ſerve in Ireland, and ordered the commiſſioners ſpeedily to execute their charge.

Theſe commiſſioners (3) repairing to Saffron-Walden, the general's head-quarters, gave notice to the officers to aſſemble next day. Then the earl of Warwick, chief of the commitee, made a ſpeech, exhorting them to accept of the terms offered by the two houſes. When he had done ſpeaking, colonel Lambert anſwered, in the name of all the officers, and deſired to know, what ſatisfaction ſhould be given them concerning four articles, viz. arrears, indemnity, maintenance in Ireland, and conduct? Sir John Clotworthy replied, That the parliament had taken care of all, except the point of indemnity, for which an ordinance would be ready in a few days. The officers demanded what generals were to command them in Ireland? It was anſwered, Skippon and Maſſey, were named for general and lieutenant-general: but for other commanders, the parliament had not yet come to any reſolution. Then the officers cried out with one voice, that if the command was given to Fairfax, Cromwell, and Skippon, they were ready to march. The commiſſioners, ſeeing the officers inſiſted on what was not agreeable to the parliament's intentions, deſired ſuch as would liſt in the ſervice of Ireland, to come to their lodgings in the town, where they would give them farther ſatisfaction; but very few went thither. Alſo then, the reſt prepared a declaration, which was preſented to the commiſſioners, wherein they ſaid, "They had reaſon to complain, that they "had received no poſitive anſwer to their deſires. "That however, thoſe who in their own perſons "did not ingage for Ireland, would be ready to "promote the ſervice: that if the ſame conduct, "under which the army had been ſo proſperous in "England, was continued, it would conduce much "to their perſonal ingagement in the ſervice of "Ireland. Declaration of the officers. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 459.

General Fairfax, who had hitherto appeared exceſſively zealous for the parliament's intereſt, ordered the officers who were diſpoſed to ſerve in Ireland, to draw out as many of their men as would ingage in that ſervice. But the number was very ſmall, and the parliament was informed, there were officers who took great pains to diſſuade the ſoldiers from this ſervice, and cheriſh the army's diſcontent (4).

At length, their boldneſs was ſuch, that ſome of the principal officers ſcrupled not to appear at the head of the mutineers, in a declaration preſented to both houſes. They ſaid, "That the miſrepreſen-"tations of their harmleſs intentions to the houſe, "having occaſioned hard thoughts, and expreſſions "of the houſe's diſpleaſure againſt them, they hum-"bly craved leave to offer ſome reaſons to clear "their proceedings in thoſe paſſages, in their peti-"tion, which they found moſt obvious to exceptions, "whereby they hoped to make it evident, that the "means they uſed, and the method they took, "was, as they conceived, moſt orderly and inoffen-"ſive; proceeded not in the leaſt from diſtemper, "and aiming in no meaſure to put conditions on "the parliament; and from hence might be diſ-"covered the corruptions of thoſe mens hearts, "who have been the evil inſtruments of occaſion-"ing the late declaration againſt them. This declaration was ſigned by Thomas Hammond, lieutenant-general of the ordnance, ſeven colonels, ſeven lieutenant-colonels, ſix majors, and a hundred and thirty others, captains and ſubalterns.

Vote to diſband the army. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 468.

The ſame day this declaration was preſented in parliament, the commons voted, that the army ſhould be diſbanded, and the ſoldiers have ſix weeks pay when diſmiſſed.

Petition of ſome regiments of horſe. April 30. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 33. Whitelock, p. 245.

Some days after, major-general Skippon, who was to command in Ireland, and had taken his ſeat in the houſe (notwithſtanding the ſelf-denying ordinance, which was no longer regarded) made report, that a letter was preſented to him, the day before, by ſome troopers, in the behalf of eight regiments of horſe, and produced it, which was immediately ordered to be read. Theſe regiments complained of the many late ſcandals, and falſe ſuggeſtions, againſt the army and their proceedings, and alleged the reaſons why they could not ingage in the ſervice of Ireland, under the intended general's conduct. The [three] troopers, who brought the letter, were called in and examined, concerning the meaning of ſome expreſſions in the petition; to which they replied, That the letter being a joint act of thoſe ſeveral regiments, they could not give a punctual anſwer, being only agents; but if they might have the queries in writing, they would carry them to the regiments, and return their anſwers.

Votes in favor of the army. Ibid. Whitelock.

Tho' theſe officers declaration was in itſelf very reaſonable, it looked however more like inſolently accuſing the parliament, than ſubmiſſively apologiſing. This convinced the commons, that the evil was greater than at firſt imagined; wherefore they paſſed ſeveral votes to give the army ſome ſatisfaction, and to hinder the increaſe of their diſcontent. At the ſame time, Skippon, Cromwell, Ireton, and Fleetwood, were ordered to acquaint the army with what the houſe intended to do for the troops, and that a conſiderable ſum was preparing for their pay, before they were diſbanded. Hitherto the commons ſeem not to have penetrated into the army's real aim in their complaints, but hoped to appeaſe them by ſome condeſcenſion.

New commiſſioners.

Thoſe commanders, whom the parliament ſent, being come to the army, and aſſembling the officers, read to them the votes paſſed in their favor; after which, Skippon made a ſpeech, to ingage them to ſerve under him in Ireland. The officers anſwered, as this affair concerned the ſoldiers as well as officers, it was neceſſary to inform them of it, in order to know their reſolution.

Charles I An' 1647.

Anſwer of the officers to thoſe commiſſioners. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 484, 488. Whitelock. p. 247.

Mean while the parliament, ardently deſiring to diſband their forces, after that army which was to ſerve in Ireland had been formed, ordered that, before they were diſbanded, a fortnight's pay ſhould be added to the ſix weeks, formerly voted, and that ſix weeks pay more ſhould be given to thoſe who would ingage for the ſervice of Ireland.

The troopers and ſoldiers being informed of what the generals, ſent by the parliament, had reported to the officers, anſwered, That, as the whole army was concerned, they deſired to diſcuſs the affair in a commitee, choſen by themſelves out of every company and troop, who ſhould report the deſires of each regiment to a commitee of general officers; to be by them contracted into a method, and, when agreed, communicated to both houſes, as the ſenſe of the army. It is eaſy to perceive, in this anſwer, a ſecret direction of ſome of the malecontents, who intended by this means to be maſters of the ſoldiers reſolutions, and compoſe in the army a ſort of parliament, in oppoſition to the two houſes. This demand, whereof perhaps very many foreſaw not the conſequences, being granted, the ſoldiers choſe two out of every company, who were ſtiled Agitators, rather Adjutators, to debate upon the matters which were to be brought before the council of officers, called, the Council of War, conſiſting of generals, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors and captains. Among the agitators few or none were above enſign's degree. Theſe two councils were afterwards continued, to the parliament's exceeding detriment, and great advantage of the Independent chieftains, who eaſily found means to admit only ſuch as were devoted to them, or not of ſufficient ability to penetrate their deſigns.

The parliament perſiſt in their deſign to diſband the army. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 491.

However, both houſes perſiſted in their reſolution to diſband the army, excepting thoſe who would ingage to ſerve in Ireland. To effect this with more facility, it was ordered, That their arrears ſhould be ſpeedily audited, and good ſecurity given them for what ſhould remain undiſcharged on diſbanding: that none, who had voluntarily ſerved in the wars, ſhould be preſſed for any ſervice beyond ſea: that an ordinance ſhould be drawn, to make proviſion for widows, maimed ſoldiers, and orphans. This done, both houſes ſetled the manner of diſbanding the army; viz. that the regiments ſhould be diſbanded at different times and places, and that money, to diſcharge what was promiſed them, ſhould be ſent to the ſeveral rendezvous. But they openly complained of the intention to pay them only two months arrears on diſbanding, when no leſs than fifty ſix weeks pay was behind.

The army openly complain. p. 497. Whitelock.

Soon after, the general called a council of war, at Bury, whereat were preſent more than two hundred officers, and communicated to them the votes of both houſes, adviſing them to a compliance with the parliament's ordinance. But the officers replied, they looked not on that ordinance as ſatisfactory to the ſoldiers; 1. Becauſe eight weeks pay was but a very inconſiderable part of what was due to them. 2. Becauſe no viſible ſecurity was given for their arrears. 3. Becauſe nothing was done for their vindication; and they, being declared enemies and ſent home, might hereafter be proceeded againſt as enemies, except the declaration was recalled.

Reaſons why the votes are thought unſatisfactory. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 497.

Alſo at this council was produced and read a petition, which had that morning been preſented to general Fairfax, in name of the private ſoldiers of the army, complaining, " That it was intended to "disband them without redreſſing their grievances, "and in a ſtrange, unheard of manner, one regi- "ment apart from another, which poſture could "not but render them ſuſpicious to the kingdom. "And therefore they deſired the general would be "pleaſed to appoint a rendezvous for the army, and "uſe his utmoſt indeavors, that they might not be "diſbanded before their grievances were heard, and "fully redreſſed; which if not done, they ſhould "be neceſſitated, tho' unwillingly, to do things "which might be prevented, by granting their "juſt deſires."

Fairfax contracts the army's quarters. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 497, 498.

The council of war, having examined this petition, believed, or feigned to believe, it was abſolutely neceſſary to take notice of it, for fear, if they ſaw all their deſires rejected, they ſhould rendezvous without their officers. It was therefore reſolved, that the quarters of the army ſhould be contracted, to prevent diſorders, and for the greater readineſs to ſuppreſs them. It was manifeſt, the deſign of this petition, and the council of war's reſolution, was to break the parliament's meaſures. It had been reſolved to ſeparate the army, and diſband them at different times and places, in order to do it more eaſily; and contrariwiſe, the army had contracted their quarters, ſo that they could very ſpeedily rendezvous, without any poſſibility of being prevented by the parliament.

The parliament recal their commiſſioners, May 30. p. 499. Whitelock.

General Fairfax failed not acquainting both houſes with the reſult of what had paſſed in the council of war, intreating them to proceed with caution, that the army might not be inſenſed, and a rupture inſue, which could not but be extremely dangerous. He likewiſe wrote that day to the ſpeaker of the commons, that he was exceſſively uneaſy about the army's diſpoſition, and heartily wiſhed ſome means could be found to appeaſe the diſtractions, which was not in his power: that he was forced to make many conceſſions, to prevent worſe inconveniencies.

and project dividing the army. Ibid. and p. 500.

Hereupon the two houſes recalled their commiſſioners (who were already gone to diſband the army) and ſent for the money which had been lodged in ſeveral places for payment of the ſoldiers: but three thouſand five hundred pounds, which was conveying to London, was, by colonel Rainſborough's men, ſtayed at Woodſtock. It was very evident, the army was unwilling to be diſbanded; but the parliament, not being in a condition to command obedience, were forced to wait 'till a more convenient ſeaſon, without however abandoning their deſign.

Ibid. Whitelock.

Their intention was to divide the army, under color of the neceſſity of ſending forces into Ireland; and, to ingage the ſoldiers, it was voted, that a month's pay ſhould be given gratis to all who would quit their regiments, and ſerve in Ireland. They hoped, by this means, to form a body of forces equal, if not ſuperior to thoſe who refuſed obedience, wherein they were greatly deceived. Mean while, to give the army ſome ſatisfaction, it was ordered by the commons, That the ſubordinate officers and ſoldiers ſhould have all their arrears, deducting for free quarters, according to the accuſtomary regulations: that the commiſſion officers ſhould have one month's pay more added to the two months arrears formerly voted: laſtly, that the declaration, againſt thoſe who drew up the firſt petition, ſhould be razed out of the houſe's journal (1). But all this ſufficed not to content the army, who were reſolved not to be ſatisfied. The directors of theſe proceedings were intirely for keeping up this army, in order to be able to oppoſe the Preſbyterians, who were ſuperior in the parliament. So the reaſons alleged by thoſe officers and ſoldiers being only pretenſes, had even all their demands been complied with, others would have been deviſed to prevent their diſbanding; and indeed it will preſently appear that, leſt all their deſires ſhould be granted, they added new ones, which the parliament could not concede.

Charles I An' 1647.

The diviſion between the parliament and army increaſes. Holles's Mem. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 505, &c. Ludlow, Vol. I. p. 190.

It was eaſy to perceive, that every thing tended to a breach between the houſes and their ſoldiery. The parliament accuſed the army of mutiny and ſedition (2); and theſe pretended that thoſe, under color of ſending ſuccors to Ireland, meditated forming a new army, to become maſters of the kingdom when the old one ſhould be caſhiered, or to kindle a freſh war in caſe the troops refuſed to obey. But theſe contending parties were far from being upon any equality. The army had the ſword in their hands, and tho' ſome officers and ſoldiers had quited their regiments for the ſervice of Ireland, their number was inconſiderable (3): all the reſt remained united, and were ſupported by moſt of the generals, who, bearing no good-will to the parliament, privately cheriſhed the diſcontent. The two houſes had no forces to compel the army to obedience, and therefore were terribly imbaraſſed. They durſt not drive thoſe armed bands to extremities; and contrariwiſe they evidently ſaw that the diſcord was fomented bythe leading Independents, who fought the parliament's deſtruction, for fear the parliament ſhould deſtroy them, as indeed both houſes intended.

This therefore was a critical juncture; the point being to know who ſhould be maſter, the parliament, or the Independent faction. But theſe latter had on their ſide the army, and that alone balanced the power and authority of both houſes. So well had they taken their meaſures, by means of the agitators, that the army was become a ſort of republic, where the private ſoldiers ſuffrages were upon a level with thoſe of the generals; nay, the ſoldiers deemed not themſelves obliged to follow or to aſk the advice of their officers. Hence aroſe confuſion, which was ſuffered to prevail. All was tranſacted in name of the army, a looſe term, implying ſometimes the council of war alone, ſometimes the council of agitators, then both councils together, and now the agitators of ſome particular regiments. In this latter ſenſe muſt be underſtood the enterpriſe performed, in the army's name, by the agitators of ſome regiments of horſe, of forcibly carrying off King Charles from Holmby-houſe, to Newmarket (4).

To execute this deſign, they pitched on cornet Joyce, one of the agitators of his regiment, who, from a taylor before the war, was become a commiſſion officer, and had ſignaliſed himſelf by his bravery. Joyce, being put at the head of fifty horſe, marched directly to Holmby, and came there by night, after the King was in bed. Having ſecured the avenues, he went up, with two or three more, to his Majeſty's chamber, and cauſed the door to be opened. That Prince riſing, inquired of him his meaning. Joyce anſwered, he would conduct him to the army; they having received certain advice, there was a deſign to convey him away by force. The King aſked him, whether he had the general's orders? He replied, no; but that he was authoriſed by the army: and, as he had a piſtol in his hand, ſufficiently intimated, it was by that he was chiefly impowered (1). The parliament's commiſſioners, who were at Holmby to take care of his Majeſty, would have oppoſed this violence: but that Prince's guard refuſed to make any reſiſtance; and the troops which were in the neighboring villages, to relieve that guard daily, would not come. Finally, after many diſputes, all the King could obtain was to ſtay 'till morning. That ſame night he wrote a few lines, which he intruſted with the earl of Dumfermling, to acquaint the two houſes, he was carried away from Holmby againſt his will, and that they ſhould not give any credit to what he might afterwards ſubſcribe to, while he was under reſtraint. Next morning, he went into the coach, and was conducted by Joyce, who carried him that night to colonel Montague's, and next day to Newmarket.

Is conducted to Newmarket. Whitelock. Ruſhworth,

While all this paſſed, general Fairfax having appointed a rendezvous of the army, at Newmarket, for the fourth and fifth of June, the ſeveral regiments addreſſed him with a petition, complaining of the votes paſſed in parliament, the twenty-firſt and twenty-fifth of May, as not ſatisfactory; for theſe reaſons.

The army's petition to Fairfax. p. 505.

"1. That eight weeks arrear, to be paid at diſ-
"banding, was but a mean reward for all their "labors, and a very ſlender ſupply to carry them
"to their homes, and ſet them up again in their "former callings and conditions.

"2. That, in the orders given for ſtating their "accompts, they found no conſideration or regard
"had of their arrears, incurred in the former army
"commanded by the earl of Eſſex, which to moſt
"of them were much greater than thoſe under the "New Model.

"3. That three ſhillings per week was to be "abated to foot ſoldiers for quarters, which was "more than they ſhould have paid for themſelves,
"if they timely had their pay.

"4. That there was no proviſion, or allowance,
"made in relation to any quarters diſcharged by "them.

"5. That, contrary to cuſtom, no trooper was "capable of allowance for arrears, unleſs he deli"vered in his horſe and arms.

"6. That the viſible ſecurity, for what arrears
"ſhould not be paid at diſbanding, appeared to "them inſufficient.

"7. That the ordinance voted, to exempt from "preſſing, for the ſervice of Ireland, ſuch as had
"ſerved as voluntiers in the army, was defective;
"becauſe, after their diſcharge, it was very diffi"cult for them to obtain a teſtimonial of their "paſſed ſervices.

"8. That the ordinance for maintenanc e of "maimed ſoldiers, &c. had not yet paſſed in par"liament.

"9. That the ordinance for indemnity ſeemed to "make but ſlender proviſion for their ſafety.

"10. That no reparation had been made to "thoſe officers of the army, who had been, at "ſeveral times, ſent for to attend the parliament
"as delinquents, tho' they had been found inno"cent.

"11. That there had been yet nothing de"clared, by the parliament, to clear them, as to "their right of petitioning.

(This article contained alſo very heavy complaints againſt the parliament's arbitrary power.)

"12. That the declaration made againſt the "army was yet ſtanding in force.

"13. That nothing had yet been done towards "the diſcovery or cenſure of thoſe who had "wronged the army, and abuſed the parliament,
"ſo as to procure the proceeding againſt them,
"with relation to their petition."

It is eaſy to perceive, theſe complaints were but mere pretenſes, or at leaſt, had not the army reſolved to be diſſatisfied on any terms, theſe differences might poſſibly have been adjuſted. But this was only a preparative to what they had determined on. Next day, June the fifth, the officers and ſoldiers ſubſcribed a paper, which they intitled, 'A ſolemn Ingagement,' whereby they conſented to diſband, when required by the parliament, but on condition, "That they ſhould firſt
"have ſuch ſatisfaction, in relation to their griev"ances, and ſuch ſecurity, as to their perſons, as "ſhould be agreed unto by a council, to conſiſt
"of thoſe general officers (who had concurred with "the army) with two commiſſion officers, and
"two ſoldiers, to be choſen for each regiment;
"and declared that, without ſuch ſatisfaction, and
"ſuch ſecurity, they would not willingly diſband,
"nor ſuffer themſelves to be diſbanded or di"vided."

Ingagement ſigned by the army. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 510.

This ingagement was ſeconded with petitions from the inhabitants of the counties of Eſſex, Suffolk and Norfolk, intreating the general, not to ſuffer the army to be diſbanded 'till all matters relating to the government were ſetled.

June the ſeventh, both houſes received from the general a letter, acquainting them, that the ſoldiers at Holmby had brought the King thence by conſent; having thought proper to ſecure his perſon, thro' apprehenſion of forces gathering to fall upon them and force him out of their hands: that, as ſoon as he knew it, he ſent colonel Whaley's regiment to guard his Majeſty; after which, for prevention of danger, he had ſent two regiments more to reinforce colonel Whaley: that Whaley had deſired the King and the commiſſioners, in his name, to return to Holmby; but his Majeſty was not willing to go back: that, upon this, he had ſent ſir Hardreſs Waller, and colonel Lambert, to deſire the commiſſioners to think of returning to Holmby; but that the commiſſioners refuſed to act in diſpoſing of the King. He affirmed moreover, That neither himſelf, nor the officers about him, nor the body of the army, were concerned in removing the King; proteſting, that it was his, as well as the army's deſire, to ſtudy ſetling a firm peace: that they had no intention to oppoſe Preſbytery, or ſet up the Independent government, but to leave all to the wiſdom of the parliament, without advancing any particular party or intereſt.

The general's letter about carrying off his Majeſty. p. 545. Whitelock.

It is ſtrangely unaccountable, that the King ſhould be removed from Holmby, by fifty troopers, without any orders from general Fairfax, or the officers about him, and without conſent of the body of the army; and that the general officers ſhould ſuffer him to be in the center of the army's quarters, without inquiring after thoſe who gave, or thoſe who executed ſuch orders. This evidenced its containing ſome myſtery, which was not thought proper ſhould be diſcovered to the parliament, and that Joyce knew he ſhould be protected, if called to account. On the other hand, notwithſtanding King Charles had notified to both houſes, that he was unwillingly removed (1), it appears, by the general's letter, that his Majeſty conſented to it, and would not return to Holmby, when in his power. All this ſeems ſuperlatively myſterious, and I believe the public was never fully informed of what paſſed before Charles's removal. What followed makes it conjectured, that ſome of the general officers believed it abſolutely neceſſary for their intereſt to have his Majeſty in their power, at a time when they believed there was reaſon to fear the parliament would ſtrike up ſome agreement with him; and that they cauſed him to be taken from Holmby by perſons without warrant, well knowing, they ſhould be powerful enough to prevent this affair's being ſtrictly ſcrutiniſed. Poſſibly, King Charles himſelf was privy to it; ſince he was unwilling to return to Holmby, and appeared, for ſome time much more at eaſe in the army's hands, than while in thoſe of the parliament.

Votes of the commons. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 550.

The commons, ſeeing the army maſter of his Majeſty's perſon, and no way diſpoſed to diſband, reſolved at leaſt, by their votes, to ſhew the public, that the imputations laid to their charge by the army were groundleſs, and that they were not ſwayed by ſelfiſh motives. So, June the tenth, they confirmed the ſelf-denying ordinance, and declared void all places held by members of parliament. They voted, "That the lands and eſtates "of all members of the houſe ſhould be liable to "the law for the payment of their debts." They appointed a day to hear informations againſt members, and ordered, that no member ſhould hereafter receive any reparation for damages, 'till the public debts were firſt ſatisfied.

The army marches towards London. p. 552, 553.

However, the army began to march, and advanced to St. Albans, within twenty miles of London. At the ſame time, general Fairfax ſent to both houſes the reſult of the late council of war, at Newmarket, and intreated them to think of ſome way to ſatisfy the troops.

Complaints of the army againſt certain members. p. 552, 554. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 38.

The army's approach, caſt both the parliament and city into the utmoſt conſternation, and an ordinance was paſſed, to inable the commitee of the London militia to raiſe horſes. They ſeemed to intend to put themſelves in a poſture of defenſe againſt the army. Within a few hours after, the city received a letter, ſigned by Fairfax and all the other general officers, complaining, That certain members of parliament indeavored to ingage the kingdom in a new war, as having no other way to protect themſelves from the puniſhment they juſtly deſerved. Adding, that they deſired no alteration in the civil government, nor in the leaſt to hinder the ſetling of Preſbyterianiſm, neither did they intend any evil to the city, if they appeared not to aſſiſt that wicked party, who would imbroil them and the kingdom: that they were ready to remove at a farther diſtance, if they were aſſured, that a ſpeedy ſetlement of things was in hand: that, if after all, the city ſhould be ſeduced to take arms againſt the army, ruin and deſtruction would inſue.

The parliament labor to divide the army; June 11. Ibid. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 553, 555.

This letter was communicated to the parliament, who wrote to deſire general Fairfax, that the army might not come within twenty-five miles (2) of the city; but it was already advanced to St. Albans. That very day, the commons ordered, that the ſum of ten thouſand pounds ſhould be paid to ſuch officers and ſoldiers as ſhould leave the army and ingage in the ſervice of Ireland; wherewith the army was highly diſpleaſed, plainly perceiving the parliament's deſign was to divide them.

and put themſelves in a poſture of defenſe. June 12. p. 557.

In this interval, the common-council of London ſent to the general officers a reply, wherein they ſaid, That the city intended no evil to the army, but only to defend the parliament and themſelves againſt any unlawful violence: that they did not take arms with intent to hinder the army's obtaining their juſt demands: that, on the contrary, they had preſented their addreſſes to the parliament for the obtaining thereof; and only requeſted, they would demand no more than what ſhould be juſt and reaſonable.

The common-council's letter to the general. Ibid.

That ſame day, the parliament ſent commiſſioners to the army, to know what were their deſires. The general anſwered, in letters to both houſes, That the army offered, for a month's pay, not to draw their quarters nearer to London, without firſt giving thereof notice to the parliament's commiſſioners. p. 560.

Mean while, the army continued to render themſelves formidable, as well by their propinquity, as their demands, which daily roſe higher. They at firſt proteſted, they would not interfere in any thing not immediately relating to themſelves, and that their intention was to leave the care of the government to the wiſdom of both houſes: but, when they found the parliament gave way, and wanted power or reſolution, they advanced one ſtep farther, and, by a declaration, addreſſed to both houſes, demanded:

"That thoſe perſons who had appeared againſt "the army, might ſpeedily be diſabled from do- "ing the like; and, for that purpoſe, might be "made incapable of being the ſoldiers judges, "when diſbanded.

"3. One may readily perceive, the army no longer contented themselves with medling in their own affairs, but wanted to have a share in the civil government. The house of commons contained very able heads, who penetrated the Independents views, and would have baffled them, had they been supported with power. To this end it was, they had projected the forming, out of the old, a new army for Ireland, and to cashire all the other forces. This project tended directly to the Independent party's destruction. Accordingly, Cromwell and his associates used all their best efforts to countermine their adversaries artifices, by inspiring the army with discontent, and cherishing it in the manner we have specified. In short, having tried the parliament, they believed themselves strong enough to give a bolder stroke, in using always the army's name, which they had moulded to their purposes. To this end, they caused it to be resolved, in a council of war, that the army should prefer a charge against the ablest and most powerful members of the commons, who in a manner governed and directed the house; being those whom the Independent party had most to apprehend. This resolution taken, the army deputed some officers to carry to the parliament, in their name, a charge against eleven members; viz. Holles, Stapleton, Lewis, Clotworthy, Waller, Maynard, Massey, Glyn, Long, Harley, and Nichols.

Articles of their accusation.

The general articles of their charge were:

" 1. That the persons above-named had, in a " violent and arbitrary manner, infringed the " rights and liberties of the nation, and indea- " vored, by indirect and corrupt practises, to de- " lay and obstruct justice.

" 2. That the army, being until the middle of " March last in a very orderly condition, and ready, " either quietly to have disbanded, or else to have " ingaged in the service of Ireland, those mem- " bers had indeavored, by false informations, to " beget misunderstandings and jealousies in the par- " liament against the army.

" 3. That whereas the parliament might have " had, out of the army, a force intirely sufficient " for the reduction of Ireland, those persons had " attempted to pull the army in pieces, and put " the kingdom to the trouble and expense of rais- " ing a new force for that service.

" 4. That they had diverted the forces ingaged " for the service of Ireland, and indeavored to " apply them to carry on desperate designs of their " own in England; and had also raised new forces, " under pretense to guard the parliament, and pri- " vately lifted officers and soldiers, for imbroiling " the kingdom in a new and bloody war.

" 5. That they had invited and incouraged di- " verse reformades, with other officers and soldiers " tumultuously to gather together at Westminster, " to affright and assault the members of parlia- " ment."

Charles I An' 1647.

The very next day, the army sent propofals to the commons, wherein they desired:

The army's demands. Whitelock, p. 253.

" That the persons impeached might be forth- " with suspended from siting in the house.

" That there might be a month's pay imme- " diately sent to the army.

" That if the officers and soldiers of the army, " who had ingaged for Ireland, or those who had " deserted the army and come to London, had " since then received more than a month's pay, " there might be so much more money sent down " to the army.

" That during the debate and transaction, be- " twixt the parliament and army, about raising " and lifting new forces, the parliament would not " suffer any new forces to be raised within the " kingdom."

These demands strangely imbarassed both houses. They could not reject them without furnishing the army with a pretense to march for London, where was nothing ready to oppose them; and, by conceding, gave them occasion to make farther demands. This perplexity was the greater, as several counties seconded the army, and pretended, it was absolutely necessary to continue them, to stop the progress of that arbitrary power which the parliament assumed. We have already seen, that the counties of Essex, Suffolk and Norfolk had, in some measure, declared for the army. Those of Bucks and Hertford followed this example, and Glamorganshire openly complained, by deputies sent purposely, that the people were oppressed by the parliament and by their commitees setled in the several counties (1).

Some counties side with the army. Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 520, 559, 573, 575, 578.

Both houses hereupon thought proper to divert this impending storm, by giving satisfaction to the army, in order to remove all pretense of complaint; for it was easy to perceive that was what they wanted. It was therefore resolved, That the order for lifting forces, and the permission given to the commitee of the London militia, to augment the trained-bands, should be void: that the army should have a month's pay, and the general be required to remove it forty miles from London. Some days after, a month's pay was also granted to the Northern forces; and, to let the army see there was no design to disband them, the parliament passed an ordinance for raising sixty thousand pounds per month for their maintenance, and for the service of Ireland (2). Lastly, the house of commons wrote to general Fairfax, that they were ready to receive from him any particular charge against the eleven accused members.

The parliament resolve to satisfy the army. June 16. p. 574, 575, 581. p. 582. p. 584. Whitelock.

This condescension might have produced peace between the parliament and army, had peace been what the army desired. But instead of being obliged to the parliament for this compliance, they were rather insensed at it, as being sensible that its design was only to break their measures, by taking away all pretense of complaint. They would have been better pleased, that all their demands had been denied, in order to have a plausible excuse to be their own carvers. They were afraid the parliament, by indeavoring to gain time, would privately take measures, the effects whereof would not appear perhaps 'till it should be too late to prevent them. Wherefore, far from being contented, they presented to the parliament a remonstrance, whereby they sufficiently discovered their disinclination to any sort of agreement. This remonstrance contained these complaints of the officers and soldiers:

The army not contented. June 23.

(1) It was strange (says Whitelock Mem. p 254.) to see, how several counties, and the citizens of London, began to make all their application to the general and the army, omiting the parliament, and all looked upon the army in the chief place, and were afraid of doing any thing contrary to them.

(2) This monthly sum was raised, by rating each county at so much. Essex paid the sum of 4547 l. 9 s. 5 d. See Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 582.

Other demands of the army. Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 585.

"That they had yet received no answer or resolution about the eleven accused members." This point they largely insisted upon, and pretended, "they could not expect they should be called to "account, so long as they continued in such "power, both in the house, and in all the com- "mitees of the highest trust, as they actually "did.

"That the army was commmanded to forty "miles distance from London, and his Majesty's "That it was industriously published, that his "Majesty was kept a prisoner in the army, and "barbarously and uncivilly used; but all sug- "gestions of that sort were most false.

Lastly, after many complaints of public and private grievances, they said, "that they should "be inforced, by the parliament's affected delays, "to take extraordinary courses to put things to a "speedy issue, unless by Thursday next they re- "ceived assurance and security on the following "articles:

"1. That the declaration, inviting men to de- "sert the army, may be recalled and annulled.

"2. That the army may be presently paid up, "equally to those who have deserted it.

"3. That his Majesty's coming to Richmond "may be suspended; and, in the mean time, no "place may be appointed, for his Majesty's resi- "dence, any nearer to London, than the parlia- "ment will allow the army's quarters to be.

"4. That the members charged may be forth- "with suspended the house.

"5. That those who have deserted the army "may be instantly discharged, and receive no "more of their arrears 'till the army be first sa- "tisfied.

"6. That both parliament and city may be "freed from those multitudes of reformades, "and other soldiers, who flock together about "London.

"7. That all listings, or raisings of new forces "may be effectually suppressed.

"8. That the perplexed affairs of the kingdom, "and those concerning the army, may be put into "some speedy way of setling and composure (1)."

Both houses send deputies to treat with the army. p. 593.

It was visible the army sought a pretext to quarrel, and it was their interest to break very speedily, for fear secret measures might be taken against them; so it was the parliament's business to gain time. To that purpose, they impowered their commissioners in the army to treat with them upon all points in dispute.

The eleven members desire leave to absent themseves. June 25. p. 592, 593.

Mean while, the commons voted, "That, by "the law, no judgment can be given to suspend "the eleven members from siting in the house, "upon the papers presented from the army, be- "fore the particulars be produced, and proofs "made." But a good expedient was found to molify this refusal, viz. that the parties accused should, of their own accord, desire leave to absent themselves from the house; which was granted, and the army remained satisfied.

Fairfax writes to the city. June 26. Ibid.

About this time, the army drawing a little nearer London, probably with design to awe the parliament, general Fairfax wrote to the lord-mayor and aldermen, that they had nothing to fear from the army, who had no ill intention against the city. And in effect it was in a council of war resolved, That there should be no farther advance of the army than to Uxbridge.

The parliament content the army. Clarendon.

Certain it is, that very many, both in city and parliament, wished to see a breach between the two houses and army. Some, doubtless, imagined such a rupture would be very advantageous to the King, and that one or other of the two parties would join with, and be directed by him: nay, even his Majesty flattered himself with these hopes. The army shewed great regard for him, and some of the officers even hinted to him, they were laboring for his restoration. For this reason, the two houses judged it very necessary to avoid a breach, which could not but produce many pernicious effects. Both houses therefore voted, that they considered the army commanded by general Fairfax, as their army, and would make provision for their maintenance. It was farther ordered, that they should have a month's pay, and no officer or soldier should quit the army without license from that general; that all reformades should remove from London, and his Majesty reside no nearer London than the camp. These votes being communicated to the army, they seemed therewith so well pleased, that they resolved to remove from London, to shew they intended to use no force upon the parliament; and the head-quarters were appointed at Wickham.

Plot at London against the army. Idem.

While both houses were indeavoring to content the army, a conspiracy was forming in London, to compel the parliament to take other measures, and oppose the army (2). It mortified the Presbyterians to see the Independents gain so much ground, and they censured both houses for thus meanly complying with the army. The magistrates of London came into this combination, as well as the most zealous Presbyterian parliament-members, who had not been able to hinder the late votes for preventing a breach with the army. The managers of this plot had sent private agents into Scotland to desire assistance: nay, it was whispered in London, that Scotland was about declaring against the army.

Petition of the common-council to the parliament. July 2. p. 597. Whitelock.

The first step taken by the conspirators, was to present to the parliament a petition, from the common-council of London, wherein they expressed some suspicion of their procedure. This was doubtless, in order to have a pretense to complain more openly afterwards; and to begin to lessen the peoples pre-possession in favor of the parliament. In this petition, the city complained of the arbitrary power exercised by the parliament's commitees, as well as of the ill-management of the public money, and desired:

"1. That present command be given, that no "officer of war, or soldier, do enter London, "under pretense of receiving their arrears.

"2. That such officers and soldiers as are already "paid, if their usual habitation and imployment "have been within London, be injoined forthwith "to betake themselves to their calling; and such "as have dwellings in the country, be required to "depart within two days after publication.

"3. That all who have been in arms against "the parliament, be injoined upon pain of impri- "sonment, within twenty-four hours after publica- "tion, to repair to their several habitations.

To inſenſe the Londoners againſt the army, it was rumored, that they deſigned to declare for the King (1). Nay, a pamphlet was diſperſed in London, intitled, "Heads preſented by the Army to the King's Majeſty." But the army diſowned it by a public declaration.

Whitelock. p 258. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p 602, 610.

The parliament having impowered their commiſſioners to treat with the army, they nominated, on their part, Cromwell, Ireton, Fleetwood, Rainſborough, Harriſon, ſir Hardreſs Waller, Rich, Lambert, Hammond, and major Rainſborough, all Independents, and heads of that party in the army. It appears by memoirs, inſerted in Ruſhworth's Collections, that the army's commiſſioners would not begin to treat, before the parliament ſhould have granted ſome things they demanded, and really performed them. They complained, that the parliament ſeemed indeed, by their votes, to comply with the army's deſires, but delayed to put them in execution. The parliament's commiſſioners indeavored, on their ſide, to avoid having theſe points conſidered as granted preliminaries, and inſiſted on their being part of the negociation.

p. 608, &c. 633.

This evidences that the parliament ſought to gain time, and ſeemed inclined to give the army ſatisfaction, purely becauſe it could not be avoided. Moſt of the commons were Preſbyterians, and conſequently were vexed to ſee themſelves obliged to ſtoop to the Independents, who were maſters of the army. Among the Preſbyterian members, not a few of them, being men of ſanguine conſtitutions, would gladly have hazarded a breach with the army, rather than be forced to receive law from them: but the reſt, indeed more in number, tho' no leſs enemies to the Independents, thought it more adviſeable to have patience, and try to amuſe the army 'till ſome aid might be ſecured, rather than furniſh them with a pretenſe for marching to London, and of ruining at once the Preſbyterian party and parliament. Accordingly, theſe prevailing in both houſes, all things ſeemed tending towards a pacification, which could not but be fatal to the Preſbyterians: however, there was no way to avoid it. For this reaſon, the parliament prohibited the reformade-officers entering London for two months, and gave very ſtrict orders againſt liſting ſoldiers, which was privately doing in the city.

Different ſentiments in the houſes. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 37.

Mean while, the project of raiſing forces in London, to oppoſe the army, ſtill continued, tho' with the utmoſt ſecreſy, and the agents in Scotland cauſed much to be expected from the Scots, as being concerned to ſupport the Preſbyterian party. But the authors of this project could ſcarce in reality flatter themſelves, that the aſſiſtance of Scotland could be ready in time, ſince the parliament and army were on terms of accommodation. They found therefore, they were either to break off this accommodation, or reſolve to ſee all their hopes vaniſh, and ſuffer Preſbytery to be trampled on by the Independents. To ſucceed in the deſign of preventing a pacification between the parliament and army, they found no better way than to excite the people to compel both houſes to alter their meaſures. They got therefore the apprentices, and London-mob, to preſent petitions, That the Preſbyterian government might be firmly eſtabliſhed: the inſolence of ſectaries curbed: the army paid off and diſbanded; and other particulars of a like tenor, deſtructive of the projected agreement.

About this time, the commons, at the army's inſtigation, ordered thoſe four regiments which came from the army, under pretenſe of ingagement for Ireland, but remaining ſtill in England, to be diſbanded. They permited likewiſe the eleven accuſed members to go beyond ſea, for ſix months, inſinuating to them by this permiſſion, that they would do well to take this courſe ſpontaneouſly: but as, very ſeemingly, they were deeply concerned in the London-conſpiracy, if not its authors, they thanked the houſe for this favor, without being in haſte to take the benefit of it (2).

Hereupon the parliament declared, that whoſoever ſhould bring in foreign forces, without the conſent of both houſes, ſhould be deemed traitors. It was alſo voted that the militia of London ſhould be reſtored to the old commiſſioners; and an ordinance was paſſed for that purpoſe. To underſtand this article, it muſt be obſerved that, in the begining of laſt May, both houſes, perceiving ſome motions in the army, thought proper to ſecure the London militia, and put it into ſuch hands as they could confide in. To that end, they paſſed an ordinance, the fourth of May, for chuſing a commitee of that city's militia, by which means none were admited into this commitee, or any office of the militia, but Preſbyterians, intirely devoted to the party. This change it was which both houſes repealed, at the army's requeſt, and reſtored the former commiſſioners.

Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 46. 47. Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 472, 478.

The Preſbyterian party, who had great credit in London, and poſſeſſed all the poſts, could not, without exceſſive regret, behold the parliament's condeſcenſion to the army, i. e. the Independents. They ſaw that faction increaſe daily, and in condition to give law to the parliament itſelf. For this reaſon, the ſtanch Preſbyterians, ſeconded by the city common-council, ſtrictly ingaged to aſſiſt each other, and with their whole power oppoſe the army, on a ſuppoſition, that the army intended to ſubvert what had been hitherto done towards ſetling the kingdom's tranquillity. Their ingagement, publicly ſubſcribed in London, ran thus: viz.

A ſolemn Ingagement of the Citizens, Commanders, Officers, and Soldiers of the Trained-bands, and Auxiliaries, the young Men, and Apprentices of the Cities of London and Weſtminſter, Sea-Commanders, Seamen, and Watermen; together with diverſe others, the Commanders, Officers, and Soldiers, within the Lines of Communication, and Pariſhes mentioned in the Weekly Bills of Mortality.

" WHEREAS we have entered into a " ſolemn league and covenant, for reformation and defenſe of religion, the honor and " happineſs of the kingdom, and the peace and " ſafety of the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland; all which we do eminently " perceive to be indangered, and like to be deſtroyed: we do therefore, in purſuance of our " ſaid covenant, oath of allegiance, oath of every " freeman in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, " and proteſtation, ſolemnly ingage ourſelves, and " vow unto God Almighty, that we will, to the " utmoſt of our power, cordially indeavor, that " his Majeſty may ſpeedily come to his own houſes " of parliament, with honor, ſafety and freedom " (and that without the nearer approach of the " army) there to confirm ſuch things as he has " granted, in his meſſage of the twelfth of May " laſt, in anſwer to the propoſitions of both kingdoms; and that by a perſonal treaty with his " two houſes of parliament, and the commiſſioners " of the kingdom of Scotland, ſuch things as are " yet in difference may be ſpeedily ſetled, and in a " firm and laſting peace eſtabliſhed. For the " effecting hereof we do proteſt and re-oblige ourſelves, as in the preſenſe of God the ſearcher of " all hearts, with our lives and fortunes, to indeavor what in us lies, to preſerve and defend his " Majeſty's royal perſon and authority, the privileges of parliament, and liberty of the ſubject, " in their full and conſtant freedom, the cities of " London and Weſtminſter, lines of communication and pariſhes mentioned in the weekly bills " of mortality; and all others who ſhall adhere " with us to the ſaid covenant, and oath of allegiance, oath of every freeman of London and " Weſtminſter, and proteſtation: nor ſhall we by " any means admit, ſuffer, or indure any neutrality in this common cauſe of God, the King " and kingdom, as we do expect the bleſſing of " God Almighty, whoſe help we crave, and wholly devolve ourſelves upon in this our undertaking."

No ſooner had the two houſes notice of this ingagement, but they publiſhed, by beat of drum and ſound of trumpet, a prohibition to ſign it. Contrariwiſe, general Fairfax loudly complained to the parliament's commiſſioners, and deſired to put a ſpeedy ſtop to the agitations in London, which tended to rekindle the war. At the ſame time, he ordered a ſtrict inquiry to be made in the army after all cavaliers, who had borne arms for the King, or were ſuſpected to be of his party, with a command to diſmiſs them inſtantly.

The parliament forbids ſigning it. July 24. Rushworth, Vol. VI. p. 635, 636, 639.

For two or three days there was a great commotion in London: aſſemblies were held, ſoldiers liſted, and orders given them to be ready on the firſt notice. The common-council received two petitions, one from a great number of ſubſtantial citizens, the other from the young men and apprentices (1), to deſire, " That, the militia " might be continued, as ſetled by ordinance " of the fourth of May." Thereupon the common-council repreſented to the commons, in a petition, " That, having taken notice of the " pleaſure of both houſes for conſtituting, by " ordinance dated the twenty-third of July, a " new commitee for the militia of the city " of London, and for determining a former " ordinance for the ſame, dated the fourth of May " laſt, they could not but call to mind, how far " both houſes of parliament had formerly honored " the city, when they firſt eſtabliſhed the commitee for the militia, to take the ſenſe of this " court before they finally reſolved thereupon; " which confidence the petitioners are not conſcious to themſelves to have forfeited. And " next being ſenſible, what a general diſtemper " this ſudden change hath already made, and is " like to make, in the city, they could not but " earneſtly pray, that the militia, which was " eſtabliſhed by ordinance of the fourth of May " laſt, may be reſtored."

Commotions in London. p. 640, 642. Two petitions concerning the militia. Whitelock. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 47. Ludlow. Vol. I. p. 206.

The parliament was not a little imbaraſſed in the preſent juncture, conſidering the impoſſibility of contenting at once the army and the city, whoſe deſires were diametrically oppoſite. It is certain, moſt of the members were Preſbyterians, and conſequently ill-affected to the army. Had it been in their choice, they would have declared againſt and diſbanded the army, anſwerably to their intention. But ſince the army's approach to London, the wiſeſt, who were the majority, had thought proper to comply, not ſeeing how the army could be oppoſed, if they proceeded to violence, whereof there was a great probability: however, a good number of others were for hazarding all, rather than the Independents ſhould be ſeen triumphing. Mean while, theſe latter privately cheriſhed the commotions in the city, imagining the aſſiſtance they might receive from London was ſufficient to reſiſt all attempts of the army. This was likewiſe the opinion of the common-council, the populace, and ſome general-officers, as Waller, Poyntz and Maſſey, who were removed by the new model, and were then in London. The only point therefore was to induce the parliament to join with them, and take vigorous reſolutions againſt the army: but, as there was no likelihood of prevailing by fair means, it was reſolved to imploy force.

The apprentices, &c. petition the parliament; Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 642.

To that end, July the twenty-ſixth, a great number of apprentices, with other youths, repaired to Weſtminſter, and preſented to the houſe of commons a petition, praying:

1. That the ordinance, of the twenty-third of July, for change of the militia of London, be immediately repealed.

2. That the city may be vindicated againſt a late pretended declaration, that thoſe are traitors who ſhall act to get ſubſcriptions, and that it may be revoked.

3. That both houſes do preſently make an order, for calling in all abſent members, eſpecially the eleven late accuſed ones, againſt whom there has been nothing proved to this day.

and conſtrain both houſes to grant their deſires. Whitelock. p. 261. Ludlow. Vol. I. p. 206.

Theſe demands were ſuch that, conſidering the then juncture, it was no wonder both houſes imployed ſome time in debating. But thoſe without, growing impatient, and perceiving theſe debates were intended only to amuſe them, made a great noiſe in the outer rooms. Some thundered at the commons door. Others threw in ſtones at the windows of the peers houſe. In a word, they gave very intelligible tokens of their being bent on not ſuffering the houſes to riſe before they had received ſatisfaction. At laſt both houſes, ſeeing it would be in vain to reſiſt ſuch a multitude, who threatened to tear them piece-meal, voted, "That "the ordinance of the twenty-third of July, for "ſetling the militia of London, and the declara- "tion of the twenty-fourth, to the ſame intent, "be null and void." This done, the commons adjourned 'till next day: but the thronging populace conſtrained the ſpeaker and members to reſume their places, and inſiſted on their voting, That the King ſhould come to London; which they did accordingly. On the morrow both houſes, being met, adjourned to the thirtieth.

Fairfax's letter to the city. p. 645.

On the twenty-eighth, the common-council received a letter from general Fairfax, expreſſing his good-affection and tender care of the city, but withal, his great diſlike of the petition, and the means uſed to promote it. At the ſame time, many young men and others attended the common-council, declaring their readineſs to ſupport the juſt privileges of the city *. A letter was hereupon diſpatched away to his ſaid excellency, and ſix commiſſioners appointed to follow next morning. In this letter, "They declared their inclination to "peace, intreating him, that the army might not "advance, nor intermeddle with the rights and "privileges of the city conceiving that their "ſtrengthening the city for the ſafety thereof, "was no juſt cauſe to provoke the ſoldiers. And "as for the petition, the parliament had already "declared their ſenſe of it, and therefore it was "needleſs for them to do it, and the rather for "that it had never been formally preſented to "them."

Londoners put themſelves in a defenſible poſture. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 646.

Mean while the common-council, having received intelligence that the army was advancing towards London, gave orders that the trained-bands ſhould go to their works, and that all who were able to bear arms ſhould appear, next morning at ſeveral places.

Both houſes meeting the thirtieth of July, the two ſpeakers appeared not, which obliged them to chuſe others (1). With the ſpeakers, a good number of members of both houſes were alſo departed London, it not being known whither. The abſenſe of theſe members, who were all the army's friends, rendered ſo ſuperior the adverſe faction, that this very day the commons voted, That his Majeſty ſhould come to London: that the militia of the city ſhould have full power to raiſe ſuch forces as they ſhould think fit for the defenſe thereof: that they ſhould chuſe a commander in chief to be approved by the houſe, and ſuch commander to preſent other officers, to be approved by the militia. This reſolved, the commitee made choice of major-general Maſſey to command in chief, and ordered, that all reformades, and other officers, ſhould next day appear in St. James's fields, to be inrolled, and the forces already liſted to be regimented.

Maſſey made commander in chief. Whitelock.

Alſo that day, the common-council received a letter from general Fairfax, dated the day before, wherein he ſpake very ſharply of the late tumult, and of the violence upon the parliament. He ſaid, the guard ſent from London did not only neglect their duty, but that diverſe of the common-council ſtrongly incouraged the ſeditious: that they had not kept their word with the army, which, on their aſſurance to ſecure the parliament from any attempt, had removed to that diſtance from the city: that he could not but look on them as accountable to the kingdom, for the preſent interruptions of the hopeful way of peace and ſetlement of the nation, if, by their care and induſtry, the chief actors in the late tumults were not detected and given up to juſtice.

General Fairfax's letter to the city. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 647. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 47.

Contrariwiſe, the city publiſhed their apology, by way of declaration or manifeſto, laying down, "The army's ſurpriſing his Majeſty at Holmby, "without its being known by what authority, and "under what pretenſes; and their keping his royal "perſon ever ſince, notwithſtanding his ſurpriſal "was diſowned by the general, for himſelf and "all the officers about him, and for the body of "the army. That the privileges of parliament "had been violated by the army's cauſing the "eleven members to withdraw, and by interpoſing "in the militia of London, which was ſubject to "no other cogniſance but of the King and parliament." This manifeſto included alſo ſundry other particulars which inſinuated, that the army's ill deſigns were but too evident. They concluded with proteſting, that "they ſincerely deſire a happy "and ſpeedy peace. by the ſetlement of true re- "ligion; by re-eſtabliſhing his Majeſty's juſt "rights; by upholding all lawful privileges of a "free parliament; by maintaining the fundamental laws of the land; by reſtoring the ſubject "to his juſt liberty; and by freeing this long-oppreſſed kingdom from all taxes, and the inforced "free-quarters towards the maintenance of an army, which hath long had no viſible enemy to incounter."

London's declaration againſt the army. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 648.

Both houſes alſo wrote to Fairfax, That, tho' he had given them no account of the motion of his army, yet they underſtood, he had ordered his forces to march towards London, on pretenſe of defending the houſes from the danger of tumults; upon which account, they thought fit to let him know; that, as they could not but have a deep ſenſe of the undue liberty which ſome apprentices and others had taken, to violate the freedom of parliament, ſo they doubted not but the ſenſe of ſo great an offenſe would at laſt ſtrike thoſe who were acceſſary thereto with a deteſtation of any ſuch practiſes for the future. And that, as the houſes could not imagine theſe diſorders had the allowance of the city of London, ſo they had ſince received full ſatisfaction, by the ſtrict orders publiſhed by the common-council, for preventing and ſuppreſſing of tumults, and by their declaration, that they ſhould ſit with freedom, and ſecurity from any diſturbances for the future. And therefore they ſaw no cauſe to command the army to come to their aſſiſtance; but rather judged (by the diſtractions raiſed at the news thereof) that the army's approach was like to produce great miſchiefs, and caſt the whole kingdom into confuſion. That for prevention of theſe dangers, they had ſent him expreſs order to withdraw his army, requiring him to give exact obedience thereto.

Vote to receive the eleven members. Ruſhworth, Vol. VI. p. 647, 652.

Likewiſe this day, the commons voted, that the eleven accuſed members ſhould be received into the houſe. Accordingly, on the morrow, moſt of them came and took their places (1).

Preparations in the city. p. 652, 655.

On the thirty-firſt, both houſes publiſhed an ordinance, inabling the commitee of the London militia to puniſh ſuch as did not repair to their colors, and to chuſe a major-general, or any other officer, for the forces raiſed, or to be raiſed within the city of London; and Maſſey, Waller and Poyntz were imployed in forming companies and regiments.

The army marches towards London. Vol. VII. p. 750.

Notwithſtanding both parliament and city made great preparations, thoſe of the army were not under any apprehenſion. They knew, that two or three days were not ſufficient to diſcipline troops levied haſtily in the city, and inable them to face a victorious army twenty thouſand ſtrong, well ſupplied with arms, ammunition and ordnance. They continued therefore their march to the general rendezvous, on Hounſlow-heath, within twelve miles of London. Mean while, general Fairfax delivered to the parliament's commiſſioners certain propoſals, to be negociated between both houſes and the army, for ſetling the kingdom's peace. At the ſame time, he put into their hands a declaration, by the council of war, wherein the officers ſaid, Tho' the late violence done to the parliament rendered all proceedings in the way of treaty vain and hopeleſs, 'till the parliament ſhould be reſtored to a condition of freedom, yet they had thought good to make this public tender of propoſals to the conſideration of this kingdom, wherein all men might ſee the integrity of their intentions, and the bottom of their deſires. Theſe propoſals related intirely to the public, without any mixture of the army's private views.

Fairfax gives the commiſſioners propoſals for peace, with a declaration. p. 731, 738.

The two ſpeakers and other abſent members, recur to the army's protection. p. 750, 754. Whitelock, p. 262. Clarendon, ubi ſupra.

Mean while, the two ſpeakers, and other members of both houſes, in all ſixty-ſix, who had abſented themſelves, came to the general, deſiring his protection, and ſaying that, as there was no free ſiting for them in the parliament, they had quited the houſes for fear of being torn in pieces by the mob. Nothing could be more agreeable to the army than this requeſt, which (without being obliged to ſeek other pretext) ſufficiently authoriſed their marching for London, to re-inſtate the members ſuppoſed to be driven from parliament by the populace. Thenceforward, they would not any more acknowledge the two houſes as a parliament, but ſhewed the ſpeakers and members who attended them the ſame reſpect they would have done to the parliament itſelf.

Reaſons of the ſpeakers conduct.

It was not a little ſtrange, that zealous Preſbyterians, ſuch as were moſt of the abſented members, ſhould have recourſe to the protection of the army againſt the efforts of their brethren, in both houſes and the city, to prevent the Independents from trampling on Preſbytery. In my opinion, the moſt probable reaſon for ſuch conduct is, that theſe members fancied their brethren and the common-council of London were taking wrong meaſures, and would be infallibly cruſhed by the army. It was therefore very natural for men in this belief, to try if they might avoid being involved in the ruin wherewith their party was menaced, and chuſe rather to continue diſguiſing their ſentiments, as they had done for ſome time, than ſupinely to be expoſed to ſuch imminent calamities as they apprehended. To this may be added, that among theſe members were ſome Independents, who earneſtly labored to perſuade the reſt to this courſe, as we are informed by Ludlow (in his Memoirs) who was of this number and party. Lord Clarendon gives another reaſon, which ſeems not ſo natural. He pretends, theſe members believed the army deſigned to reſtore King Charles to all his rights; and, ſeeing there were not forces ſufficient to hinder it, they were willing to avoid the effects of that Prince's vengeance, by concurring with the army in his reſtoration. But beſide that the event ſhewed the Independents had no ſuch intention, it is certain they had not hitherto expreſſed it, except ſome few civilities paid his Majeſty, ſince he was in their hands, are to be conſidered as real proofs of this intention. Moreover, this army had juſt given a ſenſible proof, that their deſign was not to reſtore the King to all his rights, by the propoſals lately delivered to the parliament's commiſſioners, whereby the royal prerogatives were intirely ſubverted, as in the ſequel will appear.

Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 207, &c. Vol. III. p. 48.

Howſoever this be, the army improved the deſertion of theſe members to juſtify their advance towards London, and to ſhew that their aim was only to prevent a new war, which the members at Weſtminſter, and the common-council of London, were diſpoſed to exite. To this purpoſe, they publiſhed a manifeſto, containing the reaſons of their marching to London; of which manifeſto here follows the ſubſtance: viz.

The army's manifeſto. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 744.

"That the army was formerly led, by the "grounds then declared, to advance towards the "city of London: but having received from the "parliament and city ſome hopes of ſatisfaction, "they yielded a ſpeedy compliance to their de"ſires for their removal to a farther diſtance. And "being in this ſecure way, and laboring after the "ſudden ſetlement of the kingdom, they had even "brought to perfection particular propoſals, to "be ſent to the parliament, for a final concluſion "of all their troubles: but the kingdom's enemies, "being moſt vigilant to fruſtrate thoſe good in"tentions of theirs, had indeavored to caſt the "kingdom into a new and bloody war: and for "that end had procured the under-hand liſting of "ſeveral reformades, and others, and contrived a "wicked and treaſonable combination; as it was ſuf"ficiently manifeſted by a declaration paſſed there"upon by both houſes of parliament, the twenty"third of July laſt, for prevention of the diſturb"ances which were like to inſue thereupon; from "which kind of diſorders the city had been well "preſerved, during the ſpace of almoſt four years, "while the militia was in the old commiſſioners "hands, whereby it appeared, there was cauſe "for the army to intreat the parliament, that the militia

Charles I An' 1647.

" militia might be returned into the hands it was " in before.

" That thoſe old commiſſioners of the militia, " were not only perſons without all exception, but " alſo men of whom the kingdom had had above " four years experience in the faithful diſcharge of " their truſt, and who were always moſt deſirous " of a peace. Yet on a ſudden this truſt, which they " long had ſo faithfully diſcharged, was taken " out of their hands, and put into the hands of " others, ſome whereof had been very cool in the " ſervice of the parliament; and this was preſſed, " and in a manner forced upon the parliament, " with the utmoſt importunity. Theſe things " miniſtered great cauſe of ſuſpicion, that the alte- " ration of the militia was in order to make the " terms of peace and agreement with the King " more ſuitable to the private undertakings of " ſome men, than to the public welfare of the " whole kingdom. But this deſign diſcovered " itſelf more clearly, in that, at the ſame time, " the alteration of the London militia was ſet on " foot, the ſame perſons with as much earneſtneſs " preſſed for diſbanding the army, before any thing " was ſetled for the ſecurity and liberty of the " kingdom. At the ſame time, the common- " council was new modeliſed, a lord-mayor choſen " who might ſute with the preſent deſign, and " diverſe perſons were left out of the common- " council and militia of eminent deſerts and fide- " lity, and others brought into their rooms, who " had either teſtified ill affection, or little affection " to the parliament and their cauſe. That the " honor of the parliament was continually trampled " under foot, and their authority affronted by " every rabble of women, apprentices, reformades " and ſoldiers, 'till at length it was riſen to the " height of monſtrous violence againſt the parlia- " ment, that they might ſet themſelves on work, " and the kingdom on fire again. That, at length, " the deſign appeared open-faced, and tho' the " militia was made the principal ground of the " quarrel, yet the preſſing ſo much the King's " coming to London, to confirm the ſame, ſhewed " that the militia was deſired but in order to " that deſign, and to force the parliament to ſuch " terms of peace as they pleaſed.

" That the intereſt of the common-council, in " their change of the militia, was claimed as the " birth-right of the city of London; but ſuch a " claim could not juſtly be held up againſt both " houſes of parliament: for then who ſhould be " maſter of the parliament's freedom and reſolu- " tions? And who ſhould be maſter of the birth- " rights of the whole kingdom, when there ſhould " be no army on foot?

" That the army, diſcerning how intimate ſome " of the new militia were with ſome of the eleven " accuſed members, and how forward they were " to comply and act with them in their indeavors " to raiſe a new war, found it neceſſary to deſire, " That the militia might be put into the hands " wherein it was formerly, that the army being " ſecured by that means from danger, might with " the more confidence retire farther from the city: " which, according to their deſire, being reſtored " again into the hands of the old commiſſioners, " ſeveral petitions were preſented to the common- " council of the city of London, in the name of " the apprentices and others, importing their " deſires, that the militia of the city might " continue in the hands of the former com- " miſſioners, according to the ordinance of the " fourth of May laſt; hereupon the common- " council of the city preſented their petitions to " both houſes for changing the militia, wherein the " houſe of lords refuſe to alter their reſolutions; " the houſe of commons anſwered, they would take " it into conſideration the next morning; not- " withſtanding which, the city and kingdom could " not be ignorant, with what rage and inſolency " the tumult of apprentices the ſame day forced " both houſes; they blocked up their doors, " threatening them, if they granted not their " deſires; and in this outragious manner con- " tinued at the houſe eight hours together; after " which, the houſe riſing, the ſpeaker, and " many members going out, they forced them back " again into the houſe. And during the time of " that violence, Weſtminſter-hall and the Palace- " yard were filled with reformades, and other " ill-affected perſons deſigned to back them. Af- " ter that, the houſes being adjourned, the ap- " prentices printed and poſted a paper in ſeveral " places of the city, requiring all their fellows to " be early at the parliament next morning, for that " they intended to adjourn by ſeven of the clock, " and that for a month. Thus the ſpeakers, with " many of the members, were driven away from " the parliament. All men therefore might judge " of the juſtneſs of the cauſe the army had ingaged " themſelves in: and if, after ſo much blood and " treaſure expended, all they were to hope for, " and reſt in, was only what the King had granted " in his meſſage, of the twelfth of May laſt, what " muſt become of the kingdom? (1).

" Laſtly, the army declared, that they would " ſtand by all ſuch members of either houſe of " parliament, as were forced to abſent themſelves " from Weſtminſter, and uſe their utmoſt and " ſpeedy indeavors, that they might with freedom " and ſecurity ſit there again. They likewiſe de- " clared againſt the choice of a new ſpeaker, " and againſt all orders, votes, or reſolutions " forced from the houſe, on the twenty-ſixth of " July laſt, and ſuch as ſhould be paſſed 'till thoſe " members were reſtored again: that they thought " themſeves bound to bring to condign puniſh- " ment the authors and fomenters of the violence " done to the parliament, and expected that the " people of London would deliver up to them the " eleven members impeached. But if any in the " city ſhould ingage themſelves to protect thoſe " members, and ſo put the kingdom again into a " war, the blood muſt be laid to the account of " ſuch perſons.

" And whereas ſome had poſſeſſed the minds of " men, that they gaped only after the plun- " der of the great and wealthy city of London; " they declared from their hearts, that they abhor- " red the thought thereof: but as they were in- " formed, that the city of Weſtminſter, and the " borough of Southwark, were brought into a " hard condition, by claiming a right not to be " ſubjected to the militia, without their own con- " ſent, they promiſed to aſſiſt them for the ob- " taining of their juſt deſires and immunities.

" That, when theſe things were duly ſetled, " they ſhould be as ready to aſſure unto the King " his juſt rights and authority, as any who pre- " tended it never ſo much."

Next day, the army being drawn together on Hounſlow-Heath (2), the common-council of London began to fear the danger to which the city would would be expoſed, if the army ſhould force the lines, which was but too likely, and this apprehenſion cauſed them to take more moderate reſolutions (1). So, taking occaſion from the army's late declaration, they wrote to general Fairfax, that underſtanding, by the declaration, that the army's intention was only to reſtore the abſent members to their places in the parliament, the city was ready to concur with them in their deſign. That accordingly, he ſhould find all ports and paſſes open, and for removing all miſunderſtanding, they had recalled their late declaration. His excellency replied, That he wiſhed all the forts on the Weſt-ſide of the city were delivered to him; and he was immediately gratified. After that, he wrote to the common-council, That the preſerving the parliament's privileges, and ſecuring the members from violence, had been the ſole cauſe of his near approach to their city.

The ſixth of Auguſt, the general, preceded by ſome regiments of horſe, and attended by the two old ſpeakers, and the members who had abſented, came to Weſtminſter, and alighted at ſir Abraham Williams's, in New-Palace-Yard. He ſtayed there ſome time, while the two ſpeakers (2), and the other members repaired to their reſpective homes.

He is conſtituted governor of the Tower, and thanked. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 757, 758, 759. Whitelock.

Preſently after, their lordſhips paſſed an ordinance for making general Fairfax conſtable of the Tower, with power to nominate a deputy; whereto the commons agreed: after that, the general was deſired to come to the parliament, where he received the thanks of both houſes. Alſo that day, the parliament ordered, that the twelfth ſhould be a day of Thankſgiving to the Almighty, for reſtoring the members of both houſes to their juſt privileges, "without the effuſion of blood," and that a gratuity of a month's pay ſhould be given to the non-commiſſioned officers and ſoldiers for this ſignal ſervice. The following days were imployed in approving and ratifying what the army had done.

Both houſes approve the army's procedure.

But this was not all. The peers made two demands, which the commons ſtrongly oppoſed.

Diſpute between lords and commons. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 759, &c. 784.

The firſt was, the making null all acts, done from the twenty-ſixth of July, to the ſixth of Auguſt. The commons were ready to give their conſent, provided it was without declaring them illegal. This diſpute held 'till the twentieth, when the commons paſſed at length the ordinance demanded by the peers, but with this reſtriction: "That no "perſon ſhall be impeached or puniſhed, for his "acting by, or upon the ſaid votes, orders, or "ordinances, unleſs he ſhall be found guilty of "contriving or abeting the viſible force put upon "the parliament, or of entering into, or promoting the late ingagement for bringing the "King to London, upon the terms and conditions "expreſſed in his Majeſty's letters, of the twelfth "of May laſt.

p. 778, 782.

Their lordſhips ſecond requeſt was, that it ſhould be declared, the parliament was not free from the twenty-ſixth of July, to the ſixth of Auguſt, and that the members who aſſembled at Weſtminſter, in the ſpeakers abſenſe, ſhould be expelled the parliament and puniſhed. This queſtion, being debated a whole day in the houſe of commons, was carried in the negative, by three voices only. (3). The lords inſiſted upon this point merely thro' compliance to the army, who, by a remonſtrance to the parliament, had made the ſame demand, declaring, they could not ſuffer ſuch members, as ſat and voted during the ſpeakers abſenſe, to intrude themſelves into the parliament, before they had given ſatisfaction to their reſpective houſes. Nevertheleſs this affair was carried no farther. Only ſeven lords (4), with the lord-mayor, ſeveral aldermen, and ſome officers of the militia, were accuſed of high-treaſon, for being concerned in the tumult of the twenty-ſixth of July, which was termed, "intending to excite a new war."

The King's ſtate and condition.

He is flattered by the army. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 38, 51, &c. Ludlow. Vol. I. p. 194, 195.

While all this paſſed between the parliament and army, his Majeſty was not only very ſerene, but even entertained great hopes from this diviſion, flattering himſelf, that the army would declare for him. Their civilities ſeemed to promiſe him a happier ſtate than when in the parliament's hands. Three of his chaplains (5) were allowed to come to him, and celebrate divine ſervice after the church of England's rituals, and all his old ſervants and domeſtics had liberty to ſee and ſpeak with him. Berkley, Aſhburnham, Capel, nay even the marquis of Ormond, who at laſt ſurrendered Dublin to the parliament, ſaw him as often as they pleaſed, in public or private, and the two firſt were actually in his ſervice. The Scotiſh commiſſioners, reſiding at London, frequently viſited, and expreſſed a great deſire to ſerve him. As they knew the Independents to be their faction's avowed enemies, they began to perceive it was their intereſt to join with his Majeſty againſt their common adverſaries. Mean while, the courteſies ſhewed this Prince, were but the effect of Cromwell's and his aſſociates policy (6). They were not ignorant how the parliament and city of London ſtood affected to them, and were perſuaded that, after all, the Preſbyterians would chuſe rather to accommodate matters with Charles, than be ſpectators of the Independents triumph. It was to prevent this union, that they had cauſed the King to be removed, from Holmby, to a place where his perſon was in their power, without either the general officers, or the body of the army appearing in the buſineſs. On the other hand, his Majeſty was by them extremely careſſed, and even put in hopes of a ſpeedy agreement with the army, as well to divert him from the thoughts of uniting with the parliament, as to deprive the Preſbyterians of all hope of ſuch union. In every declaration and remonſtrance of the army, there was always ſomething inſerted to expreſs their deſire, that the King might be reſtored to his juſt rights: but it was ever with this reſtriction, "When the affairs of the panied with theſe lords and commoners, and other gentlemen, rode along, and took a view of the army, from regiment to regiment, who received them with great acclamations of the ſoldiers, crying, 'Lords and Commons, and a free Parliament.' " government ſhould be fully ſetled," i. e. in the manner they deſired; and they knew it would then be eaſy to find occaſion to quarrel with that Prince, and retract what they ſeemed to promiſe him.

He conceives great hopes, but is over-reached by Cromwell. Ludlow. Vol. I. p. 198, 205. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 40, &c.

Charles was deceived by this policy. As he ſaw himſelf courted by both parties, he imagined they could not be without him, and that he ſhould quickly be able to incline the ſcale to which ſide he pleaſed: nay, he fancied, for ſome time, that the two parties would accept him for mediator. In this imagination he expreſſed a regard for both, and told them alternately, tho' with great ſecreſy, he would be guided by their counſels. However, as he bore the Preſbyterians a mortal averſion, he was abundantly more deſirous to join with the army, if they would but have granted him tolerable conditions, as they made him expect. Nevertheleſs, he gave ear to the propoſals of the Scotiſh commiſſioners, to put himſelf under the protection of the Preſbyterians and Scots, and thereby hoped to be ſafe, howſoever the conteſts between the parliament and army, might terminate. Mean while, he ſuffered himſelf to be amuſed by Cromwell and Ireton, who, on pretenſe they were ſuſpected by both houſes, ſeldom viſited him, yet acquainted him with their intentions, by means of ſome officers, who could converſe more freely with him, or his confidents. Tho' he was treated with great civility, he was narrowly watched, and at the very time he thought himſelf arbiter of the two parties, was really a priſoner. Since his removal from Holmby, he had followed the motions of the army, and reſided ſometimes in a town, and ſometimes at a country-ſeat, according as the general officers thought propereſt. Finally, when the army had their rendezvous on Hounſlow-heath, in order to march for London, he was conducted to Hampton-court (1).

After the army prevailed, his Majeſty had leſs reſpect ſhewed him. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 55, 57.

The revolution, which happened within a few days, and which brought both houſes in ſubjection to the army, proved fatal to this captive Monarch. He ſoon had cauſe to be convinced, that Cromwell and Ireton had only amuſed him with vain hopes. The army was no ſooner maſter of the parliament and city, but his Majeſty ſaw himſelf not only neglected, but even treated much more rudely than ever. The ſame reſpectful difference was no longer ſhewed him, and his guards would ſcarce ſuffer his ſervants to confer with him in private. In ſhort, he was left a long while at Hampton-court, without mention of any accommodation, while his words, his actions, and the perſons who came to viſit him, were carefully obſerved: nay, the Scotiſh commiſſioners were hindered from ſeeing him, of which they complained, but fruitleſly. But before I proceed to ſpeak of Charles, and his circumſtances, it will be neceſſary to recite what paſſed in the army and parliament, while that Prince was left at Hampton-court almoſt forgoten, tho' he ſerved ſometimes for pretenſe to ſeveral papers which appeared.

Rushworth, Vol. VII. p. 737.

When the army determined on oppoſing the parliament's deſign to diſband them, they pretended, they would medle only in their own affairs, without concerning themſelves with the government of church or ſtate. The demand of arrears was at firſt the only point whereon they founded their refuſal of being caſhiered. After that, finding it was not impoſſible to give them ſatisfaction upon that article, they demanded reparation for their honor, and a full vindication from the pretended crimes whereon the parliament had grounded their declaration againſt the authors of the firſt petition. Then they required, that the parliament ſhould ſolemnly declare, it was the privilege of the ſubject, and of the army in particular, to preſent petitions. After which, they formed the councils of war, and agitators, who, not content with requiring matters relating to the army, inſerted in their remonſtrances ſundry articles concerning the government. Laſtly, his Majeſty was removed from Holmby by the army's authority, as was pretended, tho' general Fairfax affirmed, that neither himſelf, the other general officers, nor the body of the army, were privy to it; and by this ſame authority, how chimerical ſoever it appeared, was King Charles held reſtrained within the army's quarters.

Charles I An' 1647.

As ſoon as the army had that Prince in their power, they pretended a right of ſetling the national government with both houſes. They nominated commiſſioners to treat on that head with thoſe of the parliament. Finally, juſt as they were preparing for their march to London, general Fairfax delivered to the parliament's commiſſioners propoſitions from the army, to ſetle the government, of which not ſo much as one related to the army's particular concerns. The propoſitions were theſe:

Articles propoſed by the Army, to be treated on by the Parliament's Commiſſioners.

" I. THAT (things hereafter propoſed being provided for by this parliament) a " certain period may, by act of parliament, be ſet " for the ending of this parliament, ſuch period to " be put within a year at moſt, and in the ſame " act proviſion to be made for the ſucceſſion and " conſtitution of parliaments in futuro, as followeth: Aug. 1. p. 731.

" 1. That parliaments may biennially be called, " and meet at a certain day.

" 2. Each biennial parliament to ſit a hundred " and twenty days certain, and no parliament to " ſit more than two hundred and forty days, from " their firſt meeting, or ſome other limited num- " ber of days; upon the expiration whereof each " parliament to diſſolve of courſe, if not other- " wiſe diſſolved ſooner.

" 3. The King, in the intervals betwixt biennial " parliaments, to call a parliament extraordinary, " provided it meet above ſeventy days before the " next biennial day, and be diſſolved at leaſt ſixty " days before the ſame.

" 4. That this and each ſucceeding biennial " parliament, at or before adjournment or diſſolu- " tion thereof, may appoint commitees, during " the interval, for ſuch purpoſes as are in any of " theſe propoſals refered to ſuch commitees.

" 5. That all counties may have a number of " parliament-members allowed to their choice, " proportionable to the reſpective rates they bear " in the common charges and burdens of the king- " dom; and that the election of burgeſſes for poor, " decayed, or inconſiderable towns, be taken off.

" 6. That effectual proviſion be made for future " freedom of elections, and certainty of due returns.

" 7. That the houſe of commons alone have the " power, from time to time, to ſet down farther " orders and rules for the ends expreſſed in the two " laſt preceding articles,

" 8. That

Clarendon Vol. III. p. 38, 43, 44——Concerning this interview, Ludlow relates the following remarkable paſſage: " Cromwell meeting ſoon after ſir John Berkley, told him, that he had lately ſeen the tendereſt ſight that " ever his eyes beheld, which was the interview between the King and his children; that he (Cromwell) did weep plentifully " at the remembrance thereof; ſaying, that never man was ſo abuſed as he, in his ſiniſter opinion of the King, who, he " thought, was the moſt upright and conſcientious of his kingdom."

" 8. That there be a liberty for entering diſſents " in the houſe of commons, with proviſion that no " member be cenſurable for ought ſaid or voted in " the houſe, farther than to excluſion from that " truſt, and that only by the judgment of the houſe " itſelf.

" 9. That the judicial power, or power of final " judgment in the lords and commons, may be " cleared: and that no officer of juſtice, miniſter of " ſtate, or other perſon adjudged by them, may " be capable of protection or pardon from the " King, without their advice or conſent.

" 10. That the right and liberty of the com- " mons of England may be cleared and vindicated " as to a due exemption from any judgment, trial, " or other proceeding againſt them by the houſe of " peers, without the concurring judgment of the " houſe of commons, as alſo from any other judg- " ment, ſentence, or proceeding againſt them, " other than by their equals, or according to the " law of the land.

" II. For the militia in general, That it be pro- " vided by act of parliament.

" 3. That, during the ſame ſpace of ten years, " the ſaid lords and commons may, by bill or or- " dinance, raiſe and diſpoſe of what monies, and " for what forces they ſhall from time to time find " neceſſary; as alſo for payment of the public " debts and damages, and for all other the public " uſes of the kingdom.

" 4. " III. For the preſent form of diſpoſing the " militia, in order to the peace and ſafety of this " kingdom, and the ſervice of Ireland.

" V. That an act be paſſed, for reſtraining all " peers, made ſince the twenty-firſt day of May, " 1642, or to be hereafter made, from having " any power to ſit or vote in parliament, without " conſent of both houſes.

" VI. That an act be paſſed, for recalling and " making void all declarations and other proceed- " ings againſt the parliament, or againſt any who " have acted by, or under their authority in the " late war, or in relation to it; and that the ordi- " nance for indemnity may be confirmed.

" VII. " time be loſt by the parliament for diſpatch of " other things tending to the welfare, eaſe and
" juſt ſatisfaction of the kingdom, and in ſpecial
" manner:

" I. That the liberty of the people to repreſent
" their grievances and deſires, by way of petition,
" may be cleared and vindicated.

" II. That the common grievances of the people
" may be ſpeedily conſidered of, and effectually
" redreſſed; and in particular,

" 1. That the exciſe may be taken off from ſuch
" commodities whereon the poor people of the land
" do ordinarily live.

" 2. That the oppreſſions and incroachments of " foreſt-laws may be prevented for the future.

" 3. All monopolies, and reſtraints to the free-

" 4. That a courſe may be taken to rectify the " inequality of rates, lying upon ſeveral counties.

" 5. The preſent unequal, troubleſome and con" tentious way of miniſters maintenance by tithes,
" to be conſidered of, and ſome remedy applied.

" 6. That the rules and courſe of law, and the " officers of it may be ſo reduced and reformed, as
" that all ſuits and queſtion of right may be more " clear and certain in the iſſues, and not ſo tedious
" nor chargeable in the proceedings, as now.

" 7. That priſoners for debt may not, by im-
" bracing impriſonment, or any other ways, have " advantage to defraud their creditors: and that " ſuch priſoners, for debt, who have not where-
" with to pay, may be freed from impriſonment.

" 8. That none may be compelled to anſwer
" unto queſtions tending to accuſing themſelves,
" or their neareſt relations, in criminal cauſes; and " no man's life to be taken away under two wit-
" neſſes.

" 9. That conſideration may be had of all ſta-
" tutes, and the laws or cuſtoms of corporations,
" impoſing any oaths ſo far as they may extend to
" the moleſtation or inſnaring religious and peace-

" III. That the large power given to com" ment of the public debts and damages of the " kingdom; and that to be performed, firſt to " ſuch perſons whoſe debts or damages are great

" and their eſtates ſmall, ſo as they are thereby
" reduced to a difficulty of ſubſiſtence. In order
" to all which (continue they) we ſhall ſpeedily offer
" ſome farther particulars, which we hope will be
" of good uſe towards public ſatisfaction."

CHARLES I AN' 1647.

Remark on theſe propoſals.

Theſe propoſals manifeſt, that it was not the army's meaning, to leave the ſole power of ſetling the government to both houſes, tho' when they were delivered to the commiſſioners, they had not yet ſubjected the parliament and city, as they did ſome days after. How much more therefore ſhould they think themſelves intitled to have a ſhare in this ſetlement, after they had the whole parliament at command? Certainly, if the army had really deſired, the govenrment ſhould be ſetled according to their propoſals, there could not be a fairer opportunity, and the parliament would neither have been able nor have dared to oppoſe it. But, on the contrary, it is very likely, the army's deſign in delivering theſe propoſals, was only to retard ſuch ſetlement, by ſtarting difficulties which would require time to be removed. For inſtance, the eleventh article, which ſuppoſed the biſhops reſtoration, and the thirteenth, which left every one free to take or not to take the covenant, were directly contrary to the Preſbyterians meaning and pretenſions. It was not for the Independents intereſt that the government ſhould be ſetled in the manner they propoſed: but it was for their advantage to dazzle the people, and make them believe, the army deſired only the kingdom's peace and ſafety, tho' in effect nothing was farther from the thoughts of their leaders and managers. This evidently appears, in that they never after troubled themſelves to preſs the houſes to haſten this ſetlement. Contrariwiſe, the parliament was yet juſt what it had been for ſome time, i. e. almoſt wholly Preſbyterian, and conſequently adverſe to the Independents, tho' obliged to ſeem quite the reverſe. The earl of Mancheſter, ſpeaker in the upper-houſe, was Cromwell's ſworn enemy, tho' he had been applying to the army for protection. The city of London was in a like diſpoſition with the parliament, and, far from ſolliciting the army's propoſed ſetlement, they very much wiſhed it might never be mentioned, in expectation that time would afford ſome opportunity to ſetle the government without intervention of ſoldiery. It is therefore no wonder, this affair ſhould be neglected, when neither army, nor parliament, nor city, had any deſire to ſee it accompliſhed. Some ſteps however were now and then taken to make the public believe it was intended. But Cromwell, and the other Independent chieftains, were very far from being willing it ſhould be left to the parliament to manage for ten years, the nation's affairs as they pleaſed; to order the militia by ſea and land, and raiſe what money they ſhould think neceſſary: much leſs were they diſpoſed to let the people chuſe new repreſentatives biennially. The whole of this was only to throw duſt in peoples eyes; the Independents wanted to be uppermoſt, as they finally were, and all their proceedings, tho' veiled with the pretenſe of public good, tended ſolely to that end. The deſign of the Preſbyterians, parliament and city of London was to ruin the Independent party, and their ſupporters the army: but as they had not ſtrength ſufficient to effect it, their project was to join with the King and Scotland, provided they could prevail with his Majeſty to aboliſh epiſcopacy. This is what was ſecretly hatching both at London and Edinburg, while indeavors were uſed to amuſe the army, by affected delays, on their demand of pay and arrears, and while London declined making the neceſſary advances, in order to render odious the army, army, by obliging them to oppreſs the country for want of ſubſiſtence. The army was yet ignorant of theſe ſecret practiſes againſt them in London. They inceſſantly demanded their pay, and the parliament favorably received their demands; nay, they paſſed votes to grant them their deſires: but ſome difficulty always occurred to retard the performance; or if any money was paid them, it was but a ſmall part of their arrears.

Regulation touching the army.

Three other affairs alſo imployed the parliament and army, for ſome time, and ſerved for pretenſe to amuſe. The firſt was, to ſetle what forces ſhould be ſent to Ireland; the ſecond, how many troops were to be maintained in England; the third, to diſband the ſupernumeraries.

Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 791, 795, 796.

On the firſt article, it was reſolved to ſend into Ireland ſix thouſand foot, four thouſand horſe, and five hundred dragoons; and that the parliament's commiſſioners ſhould confer with general Fairfax about diſpatching away theſe forces, and the officers who were to command them.

p. 184.

Upon the ſecond, it was ordered, that in England ſhould be retained in pay ſeven thouſand two hundred horſe, eighteen thouſand foot, and a thouſand dragoons. It was pretended, that the ſaid troops were continued in England, to relieve thoſe in Ireland in caſe of need: but ſeemingly the army would not admit their force being more conſiderably diminiſhed.

Upon the third, it was reſolved, that all the ſupernumeraries ſhould be paid and diſmiſſed.

But the execution of all this advanced very deliberately, by reaſon of diverſe unexpected incidents, whereof we muſt neceſſarily take ſome notice.

The King reſolves to eſcape from Hampton-Court.

Since the army had judged themſelves out of danger from both parliament and city, their reſpect towards his Majeſty was ſo diminiſhed, that it was eaſy to perceive he had nothing to expect from them, and that Cromwell had only amuſed him, the better to accompliſh his own deſigns. Beſide the viſible alteration in the behavior of thoſe who had him in cuſtody, he had many other proofs of ill deſigns againſt him. 1. The army had ſent him privately ſome propoſitions for peace, much leſs tolerably than thoſe preſented him at Newcaſtle; but he had rejected them with indignation (1), which they highly reſented. 2. Cromwell had very ſharply reproached Aſhburnham, who was then the King's confident, that, notwithſtanding the army's regard for his Majeſty, he had ſecretly treated with the commiſſioners of Scotland, to excite that kingdom againſt the army. This reproach inſpired King Charles with greater dread, as it was true that he had privately treated with the Scotiſh commiſſioners, tho' concluded not with them any points; and could not conceive how Cromwell came to know it. He was therefore apprehenſive, the army would aſſaſſinate, or poiſon him, to free themſelves from the apprehenſion of his agreeing with the Preſbyterians. On the other hand, major Huntington, whom Cromwell had imployed to amuſe his Majeſty with ſundry private meſſages, finding at length he had been the inſtrument to deceive that unfortunate Prince, warned him, that Cromwell was not ſincere, and would, if not prevented, effect his ruin. He ſoon after threw up his commiſſion, and would ſerve no longer in the army: nay, he went farther; for, after quiting the ſervice, he offered the parliament to diſcover Cromwell's ill practiſes; but they would not hearken to him (2). At length his Majeſty received private notice every day, by indirect and extraordinary ways, that his enemies had ill deſigns, and he ought to take care of himſelf (3).

He puts his reſolution in practiſe. Nov. 11.

All this made on him ſuch impreſſion, that he determined, if poſſible, to make his eſcape from the army's power: but it was not eaſy to reſolve whither to retire. There was no ſafety for him in any part of England. The parliament and city of London were both at the army's diſcretion; and, even had the Preſbyterians been able to protect him, all he could expect from them was, that they would not attempt upon his life. So, very poſſibly, his deſign was to paſs over ſea (4). Aſhburnham was, at firſt, his only confident; for tho' he believed Berkley faithful, he had not ſuch good opinion of his diſcretion as to truſt him with a ſecret of that importance. His Majeſty, thus reſolved, withdrew very early to his chamber, feigning to be indiſpoſed; and, about one in the morning, went out by the back-ſtairs, and came with Aſhburnham and Legg, to the garden-gate, where Berkley waited with horſes (5). They rode all night with great ſpeed, as well to eſcape all purſuers, as to get out of the army's quarters, and by morning, found themſelves in New Foreſt, in Hampſhire. Then his Majeſty aſked Aſhburnham, where the ſhip lay? Aſhburnham riding before, as it were to get information, returned in ſome little time without any news of the ſhip; whereat Charles ſeemed very uneaſy. Mean while, as it was not ſafe for him to ſtay in the high-ways, he concluded on going to Titchfield, a ſeat of the earl of Southampton's, where that nobleman's mother, with a ſmall family, then reſided. There he conſulted with his three attendants, how he ſhould proceed. It is ſaid, that Aſhburnham was the firſt who adviſed his retiring to the iſle of Wight, and truſting himſelf with colonel Hammond, the governor, who was counted a man of honor. He muſt however have known, that Hammond was a creature of Cromwell's, at whoſe inſtigation he had married a daughter of John Hampden, and who had lately procured him the government of that iſland. Notwithſtanding theſe reaſons, which ſhould have diverted Aſhburnham from giving ſuch advice, he ceaſed not to perſuade his Majeſty, who after ſome objections, conſented, on condition Hammond would faithfully promiſe not to deliver him up, tho' the parliament or army ſhould require him, but to give him his liberty to ſhift for himſelf, if he was not able to defend him. Purſuant to this reſolution, Aſhburnham and Berkley repaired to the iſle of Wight, to diſcourſe that governor, who ſeemed extremely ſurpriſed (6) when they told him, the King was eſcaped from Hampton-court, and was willing to truſt his perſon in his hands, upon the terms above-cited. His anſwer was, he would do the King what ſervice lay in his power; but as he was an inferior officer, he could not promiſe to diſobey his ſuperiors in what they ſhould pleaſe to command him. After ſome fruitleſs indeavors to obtain from him a promiſe, he aſked, Where the King was? They told him, he was not very far off: and at laſt, after ſome time paſſed in debate, it was agreed, he ſhould go with them to his Majeſty. So they all three went together to Titchfield; and, on their arrival, Hammond waited below, while Aſhburnham went up to the King's chamber, acquainting him, that Hammond was in the houſe, but had not made any promiſe. That Prince thereupon cried out, "O Jack, thou "haſt undone me!" Aſhburnham at this falling into a great paſſion of weeping, offered to go down and kill Hammond; but Charles would not conſent. His Majeſty, at length ſending for Hammond, ſtrove to perſuade him to promiſe not to deliver him up; but Hammond ſtill perſiſted in his firſt anſwer. Then the King, not knowing where to go elſe, and conſidering there was now perhaps no poſſible way to get from him, as he had command of the country and could call in what aſſiſtance he thought proper, reſolved to go with him to the iſle of Wight. He was conducted to Cariſbrook-caſtle, where Hammond received him and his attendants, with all demonſtrations of reſpect (1).

Remark on the King's flight.

On conſidering every circumſtance of this Prince's flight, one can ſcarce forbear thinking, he was betrayed on this occaſion. His deſign was to go beyond ſea, ſince he aſked where the ſhip lay: but there was no ſhip ready; which was ſuch a ſignal overſight, that Aſhburnham can hardly be thought to commit it thro' negligence, or imprudence. Aſhburnham is not ſatisfied with propoſing to the King, to truſt himſelf with Hammond, a creature of Cromwell's, who, according to major Huntington's information, had reſolved to deſtroy him, but even puts him under the neceſſity of confiding in him, tho' he refuſed to promiſe a protection. And yet, lord Clarendon ſays very poſitively, he does not believe the King was betrayed by Aſhburnham, nor did his Majeſty ever entertain the leaſt jealouſy of it. All therefore can be ſaid in favor of this his Majeſty's confident is, what lord Clarendon has intimated; viz. That he was outwitted by Cromwell, who, by ſome one of his emiſſaries, perſuaded him, it ſhould prove for his Majeſty's benefit, and his buſineſs be the ſooner done, that he ſhould withdraw to the iſle of Wight. If this was the caſe, perhaps Aſhburnham, fancying himſelf abler than the King, had a mind to ſerve him whether he would or no; and, to avoid being obliged to anſwer his Majeſty's objections, believed to do him a ſervice in concealing the ſecret, and abſolutely neceſſitating him to take a courſe which, in his opinion, was not the propereſt. In ſuch caſe, if it be not treachery, it is at leaſt the greateſt preſumption and temerity a ſubject can poſſibly be guilty of to his Prince. It is not eaſy to divine the reaſons which could induce Aſhburnham to imagine, his Majeſty would be ſafe in the iſle of Wight. We may preſume, he was himſelf deceived, and his eaſineſs abuſed, to make him credit general promiſes, which ſignified nothing, and whereof he could not afterwards complain. Suppoſing no treachery in what he did, his eaſineſs to be deceived ſeems to have procured him afterwards a very favorable compoſition, much lower than uſual, which greatly contributed to increaſe the ſuſpicions already conceived of him.

CHARLES I AN' 1647.

The parliament were informed of Charles's eſcape, by a letter from Cromwell, who gave the firſt notice of it, but without ſaying where that Prince was, tho' in all appearance he knew very well. He alſo ſent a letter, which his Majeſty had left upon the table in his room, directed to both houſes. He therein ſays;

The King's letter to both houſes left upon his table. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 871. Whitelock. Heath.

"That liberty being, in all times, the aim and "deſire of all men, he had indeavored to obtain "his. He called God to witneſs, with what pa-"tience he had indured a tedious reſtraint, among "men who changed their principles with their con-"dition; who were not aſhamed openly to intend "the deſtruction of the nobility, by taking away "their negative voice, and with whom the Levellers "doctrine was rather countenanced than puniſhed. "That he thought he was bound, as well by na-"tural as political obligation, to ſeek his ſafety, by "retiring himſelf for ſome time from the public "view both of his friends and enemies; but ſhould "earneſtly and inceſſantly indeavor the ſetling of a "ſafe and well-grounded peace whereſoever he was. "Finally, he deſired to be heard with freedom, "honor and ſafety, and then he would inſtantly "break thro' his cloud of retirement, and ſhew "himſelf ready to be Pater Patriæ."

The parliament cauſe ſearch to be made for the King in London. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 872--874. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 65.

Both houſes at firſt believed that the King was come to conceal himſelf in London, 'till he ſhould find opportunity to eſcape out of the kingdom. They even gave orders to ſearch after, and ſtop his perſon. But this uncertainty was not of long continuance. On the fifteenth of November, the earl of Mancheſter, ſpeaker of the houſe of peers, received a letter from colonel Hammond, informing him, that the King, from apprehenſion of his life being in danger at Hampton-court, was come into the iſle of Wight, to put himſelf under his protection.

Levellers who they were.

King Charles, as may be obſerved, mentioned in his letter, the Levellers principles, which I think incumbent on me to explain. There had for ſome time been in the army a new faction, ſtiled Levellers, i. e. a ſett of men who declared, "That "all degrees of perſons ſhould be levelled, and a "perfect equality eſtabliſhed, both in titles and "eſtates, throughout the kingdom (2):" which doctrine much reſembled that of Wat Tyler's followers, in Richard II's reign. This faction was grown ſo ſtrong, that they began to make the general officers very uneaſy, and particularly Cromwell, who feared this new party ſhould ſubvert all his projects if they were ſuffered to increaſe, tho' poſſibly enough this ſpirit was of his own raiſing. They conſiſted of private ſoldiers and agitators, which latter I have already deſcribed. During the conteſt between the army and parliament, Fairfax had not put any reſtraint on theſe men. He had allowed them to form a ſeparate council, by means of their agitators, and this council's opinions were received as being thoſe of the army, becauſe not repugnant to the general officers own ſentiments. But, immediately on the parliament's being brought under, the grandees judged it requiſite to ſuppreſs the ſaid councils, and ſend the agitators to their reſpective regiments. This was more eaſily commanded than executed. The ſoldiers refuſed to obey, and continued their aſſemblies and conferences, ſpite of their officers, and even the general's orders. Hence they ſeemingly got the name of Levellers, becauſe they pretended to have as much right as the officers and generals to ſetle the government; a principle tending to level all ranks and degrees, and conſequently to create anarchy and confuſion in the kingdom. The aſſemblies of theſe Levellers produced ſundry petitions; firſt, from the agitators of four regiments of horſe, and afterwards of ſeven regiments of foot joining them, wherein they made propoſals for ſetling the government according to their own humor; ſo that the general officers were not a little imbaraſſed. They were afraid the army would divide, at a time when their whole ſtrength depended on a ſtrict union: for this reaſon, they at firſt, in ſome meaſure, connived at the Levellers; which only increaſed the evil. Finally, the inſolence of theſe men being grown to a monſtrous height, Cromwell undertook, with the hazard of his life, to free the army and parliament from this nuſance. To that end, having notice that the Levellers were to meet at a certain place, he came unexpectedly, attended with a ſelect guard, and aſking ſome queſtions of thoſe whom he obſerved moſt active, and receiving inſolent anſwers, knocked down two or three with his own hand, and briſkly charging the reſt, ſo diſperſed them, that he took as many as he pleaſed, whereof he hanged ſome on the ſpot, and ſent others to London. By a few more ſuch notable incounters, he abſolutely cruſhed that party, which began to grow very dangerous, and reduced the ſoldiery to a perfect obedience. But this was not yet effected when King Charles fled from Hampton-court, and therefore he mentions the Levellers in his letters, as a faction in being (1).

Cromwell diſperſes them. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 67. Ludlow, Vol. I. p. 222.

When his Majeſty wrote his letter to both houſes, he hoped to be quickly out of the power of both army and parliament, and aſſuredly expected no anſwer, ſince his intent was to keep himſelf concealed. Beſide, this letter required no anſwer, as he did nothing more than expreſs his deſire of peace. But finding himſelf ſtill, contrary to his expectation, in the army's and parliament's hands, he conceived his eſcape from Hampton-court might be prejudicial to him, and interpreted as a deſign to hide himſelf, only to avoid anſwering thoſe pacific propoſitions which the parliament had prepared. For this reaſon, he determined on ſending to both houſes the following meſſage: viz.

Charles Rex,

The King's letter to both houſes. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 880. Whitelock. Heath.

"HIS Majeſty is confident that, before this "time, his two houſes of parliament have "received the meſſage which he left behind him at "Hampton-court, the eleventh of this month, by "which they will have underſtood the reaſons "which inforced him to go from thence; as likewiſe his conſtant indeavors for the ſetling of a "ſafe and well-grounded peace, whereſoever he "ſhould be; and being now in a place where he "conceives himſelf to be at much more freedom "and ſecurity than formerly, he thinks it neceſſary, not only for making good his own profeſſions, but alſo for the ſpeedy procuring a peace, "in theſe languiſhing and diſtreſſed kingdoms, at "this time to offer ſuch grounds to his two houſes "for that effect, which, upon due examination of "all intereſt, may beſt conduce thereunto.

His offers and propoſals.

"And becauſe religion is the beſt and chiefeſt "foundation of peace, his Majeſty will begin with "that particular.

"That, for the aboliſhing of archbiſhops, biſhops, &c. his Majeſty clearly profeſſeth, that "he cannot give his conſent thereunto, both in relation as he is a Chriſtian, and a King. For the "firſt he avows, that he is ſatisfied in his judg- "ment, that this order was placed in the church "by the Apoſtles themſelves, and ever ſince their "time hath continued in all Chriſtian churches "throughout the world, until this laſt century of "years; and in this church, in all times of change "and reformation, it hath been upheld by the "wiſdom of his anceſtors, as the great preſerver "of doctrine, diſcipline and order in the ſervice of "God. As a King, at his coronation, he hath not "only taken a ſolemn oath to maintain this order, "but his Majeſty and his predeceſſors, in their "confirmations of the great charter, have inſeparably woven the right of the church into the "liberty of the ſubjects; and yet he is willing it "be provided, that the particular biſhops perform "their ſeveral duties of their callings, both by their "perſonal reſidence, and frequent preaching in their "perſonal exerciſe, no act of juriſdiction or ordination, without the conſent of their preſbyters; "and will conſent, that their powers in all things "be ſo limited, that they be not grievous to the "tender conſciences of others. He ſees no reaſon "why he alone, and thoſe of his judgment, ſhould "be preſſed to a violation of theirs. Nor can his "Majeſty conſent to the alienation of church-lands; "becauſe it cannot be denied to be a ſin of the "higheſt ſacrilege; as alſo that it ſubverts the "intentions of ſo many pious donors, who have "laid a heavy curſe upon all ſuch profane violations, which his Majeſty is very unwilling to undergo: and beſide the matter of conſequence, his "Majeſty believes it to be a prejudice to the public good, many of his ſubjects having the benefit of renewing leaſes at much eaſier rates than "if thoſe poſſeſſions were in the hands of private "men, not omiting the diſcouragement it will be "to all learning and induſtry, when ſuch eminent "rewards ſhall be taken away, which now lie "open to the children of the meaneſt perſons. "Yet his Majeſty, conſidering the great preſent "diſtempers concerning church-diſcipline, and that "the Preſbyterian government is now in practiſe, "his Majeſty, to eſchew confuſion, as much as may "be, and for the ſatisfaction of his two houſes, is "content that the ſaid government be legally permited to ſtand in the ſame condition it now is, "for three years; provided that his Majeſty, and "thoſe of his judgment, or any other, who cannot "in conſcience ſubmit thereunto, be not obliged to "comply with the Preſbyterian government, but "have free practiſe of our own profeſſion, without receiving any prejudice thereby; and that "free conſultation and debate be had with the divines of Weſtminſter, twenty of his Majeſty's nomination being added unto them; whereby it "may be determined, by his Majeſty and the two "houſes, how the church-government, after the "ſaid time, ſhall be ſetled, or ſooner, if differences may be agreed, as is moſt agreeable to the "word of God, with full liberty to all thoſe who "ſhall differ upon conſcientious grounds from that "ſetlement; always provided, that nothing aforeſaid be underſtood to tolerate thoſe of the "Popiſh profeſſion, nor exempt any Popiſh recuſants from the penalties of the laws; or to tolerate the public profeſſion of Atheiſm or blaſphemy, contrary to the doctrine of the Apoſtles, Nicene and Athanaſian creeds, they having "been received by, and had in reverence of all "the Chriſtian churches, and more particularly "by this of England, ever ſince the reformation.

(1) Tho' Cromwell totally ſubdued that ſpirit in the army, yet lord Clarendon (Vol. III. p. 67.) ſays, it continued and increaſed very much in the kingdom.

"Next

CHARLES I An' 1647.

" Next, the militia being that right which is " inſeparably and undoubtedly inherent to the " crown, by the laws of this nation, and that which " former parliaments, as likewiſe this, have ac- " knowledged ſo to be, his Majeſty cannot ſo much " wrong that truſt which the laws of God and this " land have annexed to the crown, for the pro- " tection and ſecurity of his people, as to diveſt " himſelf and ſucceſſors of the power of the ſword. " Yet to give an infallible evidence of his deſire to " ſecure the performance of ſuch agreements as " ſhall be made in order to a peace, his Majeſty " will conſent to an act of parliament, that the " whole power of the militia, both by ſea and land, " for, and during his whole reign, ſhall be ordered " and diſpoſed by the two houſes of parliament, " or by ſuch perſons as they ſhall appoint, with " powers limited for ſuppreſſing of forces within " this kingdom, to the diſturbance of the public " peace, and againſt foreign invaſion; and that " they ſhall have power, during his ſaid reign, to " raiſe monies for the purpoſe aforeſaid; and that " neither his Majeſty who now is, or any other " by authority derived only from him, ſhall " execute any of the ſaid powers, during his Ma- " jeſty's ſaid reign, but ſuch as ſhall act by the " conſent and approbation of the two houſes of " parliament. Nevertheleſs his Majeſty intends, " that all patents, commiſſions and other acts con- " cerning the militia, be made and acted as for- " merly; and that, after his Majeſty's reign, all " the power of the militia ſhall return intirely " to the crown, as was in the times of Queen " Elizabeth, and King James, of bleſſed memory.

" After this head of the militia, the conſidera- " tion of the arrears due to the army is not im- " proper to follow; for the payment whereof, and " the eaſe of his people, his Majeſty is willing to " concur in any thing which can be done without " the violation of his conſcience and honor.

" Wherefore, if his two houſes ſhall conſent to " remit unto him ſuch benefit out of ſequeſtrations " from Michaelmas laſt, and out of compoſitions " which ſhall be made before concluding the peace, " and the arrears of ſuch as have been already " made, the aſſiſtance of the clergy, and the ar- " rears of ſuch rents of his own revenue as his two " houſes ſhall not have received before conclud- " ing the peace, his Majeſty will undertake, with- " in the ſpace of eighteen months, the payment " of four hundred thouſand pounds for the ſatiſ- " faction of the army; and if thoſe means ſhall " not be ſufficient, his Majeſty intends to give " way for the ſale of foreſt-lands for that purpoſe.

" This being the public debt which, in his Ma- " jeſty's judgment is firſt to be ſatisfied: and for " other public debts already contracted upon church- " lands, or any other ingagements, his Majeſty " will give his conſent to ſuch act or acts, for raiſ- " ing of monies for the payment thereof, as both " houſes hereafter ſhall agree upon, ſo as they be " equally laid; whereby his people, already too " heavily burdened by theſe late diſtempers, may " have no more preſſures upon them than this ab- " ſolute neceſſity requires.

" And for the farther ſecuring all fears, his Ma- " jeſty will conſent, that an act of parliament be " paſſed for diſpoſing of the great offices of ſtate, " and naming privy-counſellors, for the whole " term of his reign, by the two houſes of parlia- " ment, their patents and commiſſions being taken " from his Majeſty, and after to return to the " crown, as is expreſſed in the articles of the mi- " litia. For the court of Wards and Liveries, his " Majeſty very well knows the conſequence of " taking that away, by turning all tenures into " common ſocage, as well in point of revenue to " the crown, as in the protection of many of his " ſubjects, being infants. Nevertheleſs, if the " continuance thereof ſeems grievous to his ſub- " jects, rather than he will fail on his part in " giving ſatisfaction, he will conſent to an act for " taking it away, ſo as a full recompenſe be ſetled " upon his Majeſty and his ſucceſſors in per- " petuity (1); and that the monies now due, be " reſerved unto him towards payment of the army's " arrears.

CHARLES I An' 1647.

" And that the memory of theſe late diſtrac- " tions may be wholly wiped away, his Majeſty will " conſent to an act of parliament for ſuppreſſing " and making null all oaths, declarations and pro- " clamations againſt both or either houſe of parlia- " ment, and of all indictments and other pro- " ceedings againſt any perſons for adhering un- " to them. And his Majeſty propoſeth, as the " beſt expedient to take away all ſeeds of future " difference, that there be an act of oblivion to " extend to all his ſubjects.

" As for Ireland, the ceſſation therein is long " ſince determined; but for the future, and all other " things being fully agreed, his Majeſty will give full " ſatisfaction to his houſes concerning that kingdom.

" And altho' his Majeſty cannot conſent, in " honor and juſtice, to void all his own grants and " acts paſſed, under his great ſeal, ſince the twenty- " ſecond of May, 1642, or to confirming all the " grants and acts paſſed under that made by the " two houſes, yet his Majeſty is confident that, " upon the peruſal of particulars, he ſhall give " ſatisfaction to his two houſes to what may be " reaſonably deſired in that particular.

" And now his Majeſty conceives that, by theſe " his offers, which he is ready to make good " upon the ſetlement of a peace, he hath clearly " manifeſted his intentions to give full ſecurity and " ſatisfaction to all intereſts, for what can juſtly be " deſired in order to the future happineſs of his peo- " ple, and for the perfecting theſe conceſſions, as " alſo for ſuch other things as may be propoſed " by the two houſes; and for ſuch juſt and reaſon- " able demands as his Majeſty ſhall find neceſſary " to propoſe on his part, he earneſtly deſires a per- " ſonal treaty at London with his two houſes, in " honor, freedom and ſafety; it being, in his " judgment, the moſt proper, and indeed only " means to a firm and ſetled peace, and impoſſi- " ble without it to reconcile former, or avoid " future miſunderſtandings.

" All theſe being by treaty perfected, his Ma- " jeſty believes his two houſes will think it reaſon- " able, that the propoſals of the army concerning " the ſucceſſion of parliaments, and their due elec- " tion, ſhould be taken into conſideration.

" As for what concerns the kingdom of Scot- " land, his Majeſty will very readily apply him- " ſelf to give all reaſonable ſatisfaction; when the " deſires of the two houſes of parliament on their " behalf, or of the commiſſioners of that king- " dom, or of both joined together, ſhall be made " known unto him."

The parliament takes not any notice of them.

Of theſe offers the two houſes took no notice. Beſide their finding in them only part of their former demands, they were always on their guard with reſpect to this Prince's propoſals, wherein it was but too uſual to meet with ambiguous expreſſions, reſtrictions and conditions expreſſed or implied plied, which made it quite impoſſible to build ſecurely on ſuch foundations. We hereof have ſeen diverſe inſtances in King Charles's papers, ſince the begining of his reign; and alſo in this, where he carries his offers farther than ever, it was eaſy to diſcern the like method; for he was, as well as his father, extremely artful in the choice of his expreſſions: nay, it ſeems that, in offering to yield up all power of the militia, "during his whole "reign," words frequently repeated in theſe propoſals, he had ſome ſecret intention; as to reſign the crown to the Prince his ſon; otherwiſe, I cannot conceive why he affected to ſubſtitute the term of his reign, inſtead of that of his life, or of twenty years, as was demanded by the parliament: at leaſt it is certain, if his offer had been accepted, as expreſſed in his words, he might, by reſigning the crown, have put the Prince of Wales, by the treaty itſelf, in full poſſeſſion of the militia, and nomination to the great offices. This is indeed only a conjecture, tho' probable enough. Howſoever it be, the two houſes had long ſince refuſed treating but on their own propoſitions: neither would they allow of his explications, ſo apprehenſive were they of his ſubtilties, which would have ingaged them in diſcuſſions wherein they would have always had the like to apprehend. Such was the diffidence this Monarch's character had bred, which ever made impracticable a reconciliation between him and the parliament. It muſt however be acknowledged that, on this occaſion, there were other reaſons which hindered the two houſes from regarding his ſaid Majeſty's offers. The principal was, they were under ſubjection to the army, or rather the Independents, who were not for peace on any terms whatever.

Negociation of the Scotiſh commiſſioners with his Majeſty. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 76.

During King Charles's ſtay at Hampton-court, the Scotiſh commiſſioners, as has been hinted, had treated with him, and put him in hope, that the Scots would join with the Cavaliers and Engliſh Preſbyterians, to reſcue him from the Independents. But they required what he could not ever reſolve to grant, viz. the change of epiſcopal government in the Engliſh church into Preſbyterian. This ſingle point had prolonged the negociation, and hindered the treaty's concluſion. Cromwell had thereof ſome intimation, and probably for that reaſon, uſed all his induſtry to procure his Majeſty's retiring to the iſle of Wight, where thoſe Scots could not have ſuch free acceſs to him.

Conteſt between them and the parliament. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 850, 864, 884.

When Charles went from Hampton-court, the propoſals which both houſes intended for him, were all ready. But the Scotiſh commiſſioners defered from day to day approving them, on pretenſe that Scotland's intereſts were not ſufficiently ſpecified, expecting to agree with the King, before they ſhould be preſented. This diſpute between the parliament and Scots ſtill ſubſiſted, when ſuddenly the peers acquainted the commons, at a conference, that, having more maturely conſidered his Majeſty's laſt meſſage, they were intirely for admiting him to a perſonal treaty, on condition he would give his aſſent to four preliminary propoſitions, to be paſſed into acts before the reſt ſhould be treated on. Theſe were:

The lords propoſe a peace with Charles, for his aſſenting to four bills. Novem. 26. p. 890. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 67. Whitelock.

1. An act for ſetling the militia of the kingdom.
2. An act for calling in all declarations, oaths and proclamations againſt the parliament, and thoſe who adhered to them.
3. An act, that thoſe lords who were created after the great-ſeal was carried to Oxford, may be rendered incapable of ſiting in the houſe of peers.
4. An act for impowering the two houſes of parliament to adjourn as they ſhall think fit.

Next day (1), the commons gave their conſent to theſe propoſitions, and ordered, that the four bills ſhould be drawn, and diſpatched to his Majeſty, after which a perſonal treaty with him ſhould be entered on. All this was done ſo very expeditiouſly, that it was not poſſible for the Independents to prevent what they were not prepared againſt. The Scotiſh commiſſioners, who had formed other projects, tried in vain to hinder the effect of this reſolution. The parliament wiſhed for peace, thereby to diſconcert the Independents meaſures. The ſixth of December, Charles ſent a freſh meſſage to both houſes, earneſtly preſſing for a perſonal treaty, as being the beſt means for ſetling a peace.

CHARLES I An' 1647.

Novem. 27. Ruſhworth. Vol. VII. P. 915.

p. 926.

The fourteenth ditto, the commons, after paſſing thoſe four bills, and approving the inſtructions for thoſe who were to preſent them, named a commitee to carry them to his Majeſty.

p. 932. Whitelock.

They then anſwered the Scotiſh commiſſioners complaints, that the four bills were not communicated to them. They ſaid; It was contrary to the rights and privileges of parliament, to communicate bills to any perſon whatever, before they had received the royal aſſent, and that there was nothing contrary to this in the treaty between both kingdoms: that they deſired the Scotiſh commiſſioners to prepare ſuch propoſitions as they ſhould judge neceſſary for the kingdom of Scotland, that the commitee might depart on the twentieth.

Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 931, 932. Whitelock.

That day, the Scotiſh commiſſioners preſented to both houſes a large declaration, complaining in a very high ſtrain, that the parliament of England violated the covenant, in laboring for peace without the concurrence of Scotland. They inſiſted on a perſonal treaty between the King, and both houſes, and themſelves, that peace might be ſetled with mutual conſent: and declared, as they could not agree to the ſending thoſe four bills to his Majeſty for his aſſent, before any treaty upon the other propoſitions, ſo they were unſatisfied with the matter of theſe new propoſals lately communicated to them; and defired, that there might be a perſonal treaty with the King, upon ſuch propoſitions as ſhould be agreed on, with advice and conſent of both kingdoms.

Declaration of the Scots; Decemb. 17. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 938.

This declaration gave great offenſe to both houſes. Their reply to it was in terms anſwerable to the language uſed by the Scots; and it was ordered, that the printer of their declaration ſhould be impriſoned.

which offends the parliament. p. 939, 940.

In few words, notwithſtanding the Scots oppoſition, thoſe bills were preſented to his Majeſty, the twenty-fourth of December. Next day, the Scotiſh commiſſioners arrived at the iſle of Wight, and delivered to King Charles a declaration of their diſſent to the propoſitions they had lately ſeen, and the four bills brought him. That done, they had a conference with the King, wherein paſſed certain matters which long remained ſecret, and which it will be neceſſary to recite here, ſince they were the ſourſe of thoſe events the reader will meet with hereafter.

The four bills preſented to his Majeſty. p. 946. The Scots declare their diſſent thereto. Clarendon. Vol. III. p. 67. Whitelock. Heath. p. 158.

Since King Charles's being in the army's power, the Scots feared he would unite with them. They were ſenſible of the Independents mortal hatred to them, and conſequently that ſuch union could not but be very prejudicial to Scotland. The army's ſucceſs againſt the parliament and city of London greatly increaſed their dread, and put them upon ſeeking means to avert, as they thought, the impending danger. They found no method properer than to join with the King, provided he could be perſuaded to approve the covenant, and aboliſh epiſcopacy in England. In their frequent conferences with him at Hampton-court, they inſinuated; That, when he was delivered to the parliament, it was not with the advice of all Scotland, but only by the marquis of Argyle's credit, who tyranniſed over the kingdom: that all the Scots were diſpleaſed with it, and ready to attone for the fault, by aſſiſting him with all their power to recover his juſt rights. But they added; That, to ingage the Scots to imploy their forces to this end, his Majeſty was to give them ſatisfaction concerning the covenant, and the abolition of epiſcopacy in England; for, otherwiſe, he could not expect any aſſiſtance from the Engliſh Preſbyterians, which was abſolutely neceſſary. In ſhort, they made him hope, that the Scots would enter England with a ſtrong army, which, by the junction of the Royaliſts, and Engliſh Preſbyterians, would become ſo ſuperior to the Independents army, that he might almoſt be aſſured, nothing would be capable to oppoſe his reſtoration.

Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 76, &c.

Theſe overtures were the more agreeable to King Charles, as duke Hamilton, after his releaſe from impriſonment by the army, had declared to the King's friends, that he was ready to do his Majeſty whatever ſervice lay in his power. Moreover the marquis of Ormond had acquainted that Prince with his project of returning into Ireland, joining lord Inchiquin (whom he had privately gained) and ſome of the leading rebels, and making war upon the parliament; affirming, that France had promiſed to ſupply him with all neceſſaries. It was very probable, that ſuch union between Charles's party, the Engliſh Preſbyterians and the Scots, added to a diverſion in Ireland, would very much imbaraſs the Independents, and diſable them to withſtand ſo great a power: but to execute this project, his Majeſty muſt approve the covenant, and conſent to the abolition of epiſcopacy; articles he could never admit. Theſe were the two ſtumbling-blocks which hindered him from concluding a treaty with the Scotiſh commiſſioners, before his retreat from Hampton-court. He would never grant theſe two points, and, in expectation that, by his ſteadineſs, he ſhould induce the Scots to deſiſt from their deſires, quited Hampton-court without any agreement with them. When therefore he ſo earneſtly preſſed for a perſonal treaty at London, with honor, freedom and ſafety, it was in order to treat more commodiouſly with the Scots, and conſult his friends, concerning what might be expected as well from his own as the Preſbyterian party; and, doubtleſs, had he concluded a treaty with them, his deſign was to have prolonged the negociation with both houſes, 'till the Scotiſh army entered England, and his old and new partiſans had concerted all their meaſures (a). In all probability, this league would have found the army ſo much imployment, that they would not a ſecond time be able to ſubdue the parliament and city of London. Accordingly, this was preciſely what the Scotiſh commiſſioners had propoſed to themſelves, in their objections to the propoſitions, and in their demand of a perſonal treaty with the King, upon ſuch propoſals as ſhould be agreed on by both kingdoms; being well aſſured, they might eaſily have ſpun out time 'till all ſhould have been in a readineſs.

Ibid.

The method both houſes took to procure his Majeſty's conſent to the four bills, among which was that of the militia, before they admited him to a perſonal treaty, convinced that Prince of their not having any deſign to relax upon any of the principal articles. He conſidered; That, after paſſing theſe four bills, he ſhould ſtill be forced to treat on propoſitions much like thoſe preſented him at Newcaſtle: that, after all, what the parliament ſtiled treating, was, according to their ſenſe, yielding to their demands, and, on the leaſt refuſal to grant what ſhould be propoſed to him, he ſhould perhaps be more cloſely confined, when he had paſſed one of the moſt important points in diſpute: that then, he ſhould not be able to treat with the Scots, and by paſſing thoſe four bills ſhould loſe the preſent opportunity, which would never offer again. Theſe conſiderations determined him to agree with the Scotiſh commiſſioners, at a ſecond conference with them, the twenty-fifth of December. As there was no time to loſe, the parliament's agents having orders to ſtay but four days in the iſle of Wight, the Scots had brought with them a treaty ready drawn, agreeable to the propoſitions they had made the King at Hampton-court. This treaty was next day ſigned by his Majeſty and the Scotiſh commiſſioners, Charles having had but few hours to reſolve. Here follows the ſubſtance of this treaty, which lord Clarendon ſays was read but by very few, and which he repreſents as the moſt unjuſt treaty could poſſibly have been impoſed on this Prince. This obliges me to make remarks on ſome of the articles.

The ſubſtance of this treaty. p. 78.

IN the preface, his ſaid Majeſty acknowledged, "That the intentions of thoſe who had entered "into the covenant, were real for the preſervation "of his Majeſty's perſon and authority, according "to their allegiance, and no way to diminiſh his "juſt power and greatneſs. He promiſed, as ſoon "as he could, with freedom, honor and ſafety, to "be preſent in a free parliament, to confirm the ſaid "league and covenant by act of parliament in both "kingdoms, for the ſecurity of all who had taken, "or ſhould take it." With this proviſo however, "That none who was unwilling ſhould be con-"ſtrained to take it (1).

REMARK (1). If it is conſidered, that the Scots joined their forces with thoſe of England, ſolely in defenſe of this covenant, which had been formerly ſworn to in both kingdoms, it will not be thought ſtrange, the Scotiſh commiſſioners ſhould require of King Charles this promiſe. Without this, there would have been no poſſibility of ingaging the Scots to imploy their forces to reſtore this Prince to his rights, and, how hard ſoever this condition might appear to him, it was abſolutely neceſſary to produce the effect which he expected from his union with Scotland.

"His Majeſty ingaged to confirm in England "by act of parliament, Preſbyterian govern-"ment; the directory for worſhip; and the aſ-"ſembly of divines at Weſtminſter for three "years; ſo that his Majeſty and his houſhold "ſhould not be hindered from uſing that form of "divine ſervice he had formerly practiſed (2): "And that, during theſe three years, there ſhould "be a conſultation with the aſſembly of divines, "to which twenty of the King's nomination ſhould "be added, and ſome from the church of Scot-"land; and thereupon it ſhould be determined, "by his Majeſty and the two houſes of parlia-"ment, what form of government ſhould be eſta-

(a) This conjecture is confirmed, by his Majeſty's letter to the earl of Lanerick, dated at Cariſbrook, November 19, 1647, wherein he ſays, "That his meſſage from thence to both houſes will, he believes, have diverſe interpretations, and be diſliked "by the Scotiſh commiſſioners; but the end of it was to procure a perſonal treaty. This he thought neceſſary to tell him, "that he might aſſure his fellow commiſſioners, that change of place had not altered his mind from what it was when he ſaw "him laſt." " bliſhed after the expiration of thoſe years, as " ſhould be moſt agreeable to the word of God.

REM. (2) Theſe Scotiſh commiſſioners were not ſo ſtupid as to imagine that the Scots, with their own ſingle forces, ſhould be able to effect King Charles's reſtoration: they depended chiefly on the Engliſh Preſbyterians aſſiſtance. But how was it poſſible for them to rely on their aid, if nothing of what they wanted was ſtipulated? Nay, it is aſtoniſhing they ſhould be ſatisfied with a ſetlement which was to laſt only three years, conſidering how they themſelves, and the Engliſh Preſbyterians (whoſe aſſiſtance was indiſpenſible) ſtood affected. Undoubtedly, King Charles himſelf did not think he was forced upon this point, ſince he had offered the ſame thing to both houſes, in his meſſage of the tenth of December.

" That ſome effectual courſe may be taken, by " act of parliament, and all other ways needful or " expedient, for the ſuppreſſing the opinions and " practiſes of Anti-Trinitarians, Arians, So- " cinians, Anti-Scripturaliſts, Anabaptiſts, Anti- " nomians, Arminians, Familiſts, Browniſts, Se- " paratiſts, Independents, Libertines, and Seekers, " and generally, for the ſuppreſſing of all blaſ- " phemy, hereſy, ſchiſm, and all ſuch ſcandalous " doctrines and practiſes as are contrary to the " light of nature, and to the principles of Chriſ- " tianity, whether concerning faith, worſhip or " converſation, or the power of godlineſs, or " which may be deſtructive to order and govern- " ment, or to the peace of the church and king- " dom (3.)

REM. (3) All theſe ſects mentioned in this article, were no leſs enemies to the Preſbyterians than to the church of England. Theſe three laſt articles being preciſely what King Charles had offered, in his meſſage of the ſixteenth of November, it cannot be ſaid that he granted them thro' ſurpriſe or compulſion.

His Majeſty promiſed, " That in the next ſeſ- " ſion of parliament, after the kingdom of Scot- " land ſhould declare for him, in purſuance of " this agreement, he ſhould in perſon, or by " commiſſion, confirm the League and Covenant " in that kingdom; and concerning all the acts " paſſed in the laſt parliament of that kingdom, " his Majeſty declared, that he ſhould then like- " wiſe be content to give aſſurance, by act of parlia- " ment, that neither he nor his ſucceſſors ſhould " quarrel, call in queſtion; or command the con- " trary of any of them, nor queſtion any for giving " obedience to the ſame."

Next after theſe articles concerning religion, followed a long recital of " the agreement the parlia- " ment of England had made, when the Scots " army returned to Scotland, that the army un- " der Fairfax ſhould be diſbanded; and of that " army's ſubmiting thereunto; of their taking the " King from Holmby, and keeping him priſoner " 'till he fled from them to the iſle of Wight; " and ſince that time both his Majeſty, and the " commiſſioners for the kingdom of Scotland, had " very earneſtly deſired, that the King might " come to London in ſafety, honor and freedom, " for a perſonal treaty with the two houſes, and " the commiſſioners of the parliament of Scotland; " which, they ſaid, had been granted, but that " the army had, in a violent manner, forced away " diverſe members of the parliament from the diſ- " charge of their truſt, and poſſeſſed themſelves " of the city of London, and all the ſtrengths " and gariſons of the kingdoms: and that, by " the ſtrength and influence of that army, and their " adherents, propoſitions and bills had been ſent to " the King without the advice and conſent of the " kingdom of Scotland, contrary to the treaties " which are between the two kingdoms, and de- " ſtructive to religion, his Majeſty's rights, the " privilege of parliament, and liberty of the ſub- " ject; from which propoſitions and bills the Scotiſh " commiſſioners had diſſented, and proteſted " againſt, in the name of the kingdom of Scotland."

CHARLES I AN' 1647.

After this preamble and recital, they ſaid, " That " foraſmuch as his Majeſty is willing to give ſatiſ- " faction concerning the ſetling of religion, and " other matters in difference, as is expreſſed in " this agreement, the kingdom of Scotland doth " oblige, and ingage itſelf; firſt, in a peaceable " way and manner to indeavor, that the King may " come to London in ſafety, honor and freedom, " for a perſonal treaty with the houſes of parlia- " ment, and the commiſſioners of Scotland, upon " ſuch propoſitions as ſhould be mutually agreed on " between the two kingdoms, and ſuch propoſitions " as his Majeſty ſhould think fit to make; and " for this end, all armies ſhould be diſbanded; and " in caſe that this ſhould not be granted, that " declarations ſhall be emited by the king- " dom of Scotland, in purſuance of this agree- " ment, againſt the unjuſt proceedings of the two " houſes of parliament, towards his Majeſty, and " the kingdom of Scotland; in which they would " aſſert the right which belonged to the crown, in " the power of the militia, the great ſeal, beſtow- " ing honors and offices of truſt, choice of the " privy-counſellors, and the right of the King's " negative voice in parliament: and that the " Queen's Majeſty, the Prince, and the reſt of the " royal iſſue, ought to remain where his Majeſty " ſhall think fit, in either of his kingdoms, with " ſafety, honor and freedom: that upon iſſuing this " declaration, an army ſhould be ſent out of Scot- " land into England, for the preſervation and eſta- " bliſhment of religion; for defenſe of his Ma- " jeſty's perſon and authority, and reſtoring him " to his government, to the juſt rights of the " crown, and the full revenues; for defenſe of the " privilege of parliament, and liberty of the ſub- " ject; for making a firm union between the king- " doms, under his Majeſty and his poſterity, and " ſetling a laſting peace. In purſuance whereof, " the kingdom of Scotland was to indeavor, that " there might be a free and full parliament in Eng- " land, and that his Majeſty may be with them " in honor, ſafety and freedom; and that a " ſpeedy period be ſet to the preſent parliament. " And they undertook, that the army which they " would raiſe, ſhould be upon its march, before " the meſſage and declaration ſhould be delivered to " the houſes." It was farther ſtipulated, " That " all ſuch in the kingdoms of England and Ire- " land, as would join with the kingdom of Scot- " land, in purſuance of this agreement, ſhould be " protected by his Majeſty in their perſons and " eſtates; and that all his ſubjects in England, or " Ireland, who would join with him in purſuance " of this agreement, might come to the Scotiſh " army and join them, or elſe put themſelves into " other bodies in England, or Wales, for proſe- " cution of the ſame ends, as the King's Majeſty " ſhould judge moſt convenient, and under ſuch " commanders or generals of the Engliſh nation, " as his Majeſty ſhall think fit: and that all ſuch " ſhould be protected by the kingdom of Scotland " and their army, in their perſons and eſtates, and " where any injury or wrong is done unto them, " they would be careful to ſee them fully repaired, " as far as it ſhould be in their power to do; and " likewiſe when any injury or wrong is done to " thoſe who join with the kingdom of Scotland, " his Majeſty ſhould be careful of their full repa- " ration (4)."

REM. (4) When theſe five articles are reflected on, the

the very conſiderable benefits which accrued to King Charles by his condeſcenſion to eſtabliſh Preſbytery in England, for three years, are manifeſtly evident. But ſome mens prejudice againſt this perſuaſion, makes them think his Majeſty paid very dear for the advantages he expected to reap from his union with Scotland.

They obliged his Majeſty to promiſe, " That " neither himſelf nor any by his authority or " knowledge, ſhould make or admit any ceſſation, " pacification, or agreement whatſoever for peace, " nor of any treaty, propoſitions, bills, or any " other ways for that end, with the houſes of par- " liament, or any army or party in England or " Ireland, without the advice and conſent of the " kingdom of Scotland, and reciprocally, that " neither the kingdom of Scotland, nor any having " their authority, ſhould make or admit of any " of theſe, any manner of way with any what- " ſoever, without his Majeſty's advice or con- " ſent: and that upon ſetling a peace, there ſhould " be an act of oblivion to be agreed upon by his " Majeſty, and the parliaments of both his king- " doms. That his Majeſty, the Prince, or both, " ſhould come into Scotland, upon the invitation " of that kingdom, and their declaration, that they " ſhould be in honor, freedom and ſafety when poſ- " ſibly they could come with ſafety and conve- " nience; and that the King ſhould contribute his " utmoſt indeavor, both at home and abroad, to- " wards aſſiſting the kingdom of Scotland for carry- " ing on this war both by ſea and land, and all " other ſupplies by monies, arms, ammunition and " all other things requiſite, as alſo for guarding " the coaſts of Scotland with ſhips, and protect- " ing all their merchants in the free exerciſe of " their trade and commerce with other nations: " and likewiſe, that his Majeſty was willing, and " did authoriſe the Scotiſh army to poſſeſs them- " ſelves of Berwick, Carliſle, Newcaſtle upon " Tine, with the caſtle of Tinmouth, and the " town of Hartlepool: thoſe places to be their re- " treat and magazines; and that when the peace " of the kingdom ſhould be ſetled, the kingdom " of Scotland ſhould remove all their forces, and " deliver back thoſe towns and caſtles.

" The King promiſed alſo, and undertook to " pay the arrears of the brotherly aſſiſtance, and " likewiſe the two hundred thouſand pounds, " which remained ſtill due upon the laſt treaty for " return of the Scotiſh army, when they delivered " up the King (5).

Rem. (5) If the four hundred thouſand pounds promiſed the Scotiſh army, when they quited England, be conſidered as their reward, or price whereat they ſold the King's perſon, nothing could be more unreaſonable than conſtraining that Prince to diſcharge the ſaid ſum of money. But if it was really due to the Scots for their arrears, his Majeſty, by the firſt article of this treaty, approving the covenant of both kingdoms, the Scots could urge, that he was bound to ſee them paid the expenſe they had been at in maintaining the ſaid covenant.

Moreover, " That payment ſhould be made to " the kingdom of Scotland, for the charge and ex- " penſe of their army in this future war, with due " recompenſe for the loſſes they ſhould ſuſtain there- " in, and that due ſatisfaction, according to the " treaty on that behalf betwixt the two kingdoms, " ſhould be made to the Scotiſh army in Ireland, " out of the lands of this kingdom, or otherwiſe: " and that the King, according to the intention of " his father, ſhould indeavor a complete union of " the two kingdoms, ſo as they may be one under " his Majeſty, and all his poſterity; or, if that " cannot ſpeedily be effected, that all liberties and " privileges concerning commerce, traffic, manu- " factures, peculiar to the ſubjects of either nation, " ſhould be common to the ſubjects of both king- " doms without diſtinction; and that there be " a communication, and mutual capacity of all " other liberties of the ſubjects in the two king- " doms (6).

Charles I An' 1647.

Rem. (6) If his Majeſty, by his own authority, could not unite the two kingdoms, without the two parliaments concurrence, neither could he, without the ſame concurrence, make common the privileges of both kingdoms. So, probably, this article was put into the treaty only to dazzle the Scots.

" That a competent number of ſhips ſhould be " yearly aſſigned and appointed out of his Ma- " jeſty's navy, which ſhould attend the coaſt of " Scotland for a guard, and freedom of trade of " that nation; and that his Majeſty ſhould declare, " that his ſucceſſors, as well as himſelf, are obliged " to the performance of the articles and conditions " of this agreement; but that his Majeſty ſhall " not be obliged to the performance of the afore- " ſaid articles, 'till the kingdom of Scotland ſhould " declare for him, in purſuance of this agreement; " and that the whole articles and conditions afore- " ſaid ſhall be finiſhed, perfected and performed " before the return of the Scotiſh army; and that " when they return into Scotland, at the ſame " time, 'ſimul & ſemel,' all armies ſhould be diſ- " banded in England." The King ingaged himſelf alſo, " To imploy thoſe of the Scotiſh nation, " equally with the Engliſh, in all foreign imploy- " ments and negociations; and that a third part of " all the offices and places about the King, Queen " and Prince ſhould be confered upon perſons of " that nation; and that the King and Prince, or " one of them, will frequently reſide in Scotland, " that the ſubjects of that kingdom may be known " to them."

Charles's conſent, by this treaty, to eſtabliſh Preſbytery in England, for three years, lying heavy on his mind, he prevailed with the commiſſioners, that it ſhould be inſerted, under the ſame treaty; " That his Majeſty did declare, that, by the clauſe " of confirming Preſbyterian government by act " of parliament, he is neither obliged to deſire the " ſetling of Preſbyterian government, nor to pre- " ſent any bills to that effect; and that he likewiſe " underſtands, that no perſon whatſoever ſhall ſuffer " in his eſtate, nor undergo any corporal puniſh- " ment, for not ſubmiting to Preſbyterian govern- " ment; his Majeſty underſtanding, that this in- " demnity ſhould not extend to thoſe who are men- " tioned in thoſe articles againſt toleration."

To this the Scotiſh commiſſioners ſubſcribed their hands, as witneſſes only, as they ſaid, and not as aſſenters.

Lord Clarendon, in his hiſtory of the civil wars of England, thus exclaims againſt the injuſtice of this treaty; viz. Vol. III. p. 82.

" No man who reads this treaty (which very " few men have ever done) can wonder, that ſuch " an ingagement met with the fate which attended " it; which contained ſo many monſtrous conceſ- " ſions that, except the whole kingdom of England " had been likewiſe impriſoned in Cariſbrook-caſtle " with the King, it could not be imagined, that it " was poſſible to be performed."

To confeſs a truth, whatever eſteem I may have for that illuſtrious hiſtorian, this bare aſſertion, without any explication, is not to me at all ſatisfactory. After having ſtrictly ſcrutiniſed every clauſe of this treaty, I meet not with any which to me appear monſtrous. Indeed, the article of ſetling the Preſbyterian government in England, for three years, might ſeem ſo to the earl of Clarendon, and ſuch as join with his lordſhip in ſentiment. The reader is to judge, whether this monſtroſity (if I may uſe that expreſſion) is to be aſcribed to the thing itſelf, or to the hiſtorian's prepoſſeſſion (1).

King Charles, having concluded his treaty with the Scotiſh commiſſioners, delivered to the parliament's deputies this anſwer: viz.

Charles's anſwer to the parliament's commiſſioners. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 68. Heath. p. 160.

"That his Majeſty had always thought it a "matter of great difficulty, to comply in ſuch a "manner with all ingaged intereſts, that a firm "and laſting peace might inſue; in which opinion "he was now confirmed, ſince the commiſſioners "for Scotland did ſolemnly proteſt againſt the "ſeveral bills, and propoſitions, which the two "houſes of parliament had preſented to him for his "aſſent; ſo that it was not poſſible for him to "give ſuch anſwer as might be the foundation of "a hopeful peace. That beſide, the four bills, as "they were offered to him, did not only diveſt "him of all Sovereignty, and leave him without "any poſſibility of recovering it to him or his ſuc-"ceſſors, but opened a door for all intolerable op-"preſſions upon his ſubjects, he granting ſuch ar-"bitrary and illimited power to the two houſes. "That neither the deſire of being freed from that "tedious and irkſome condition of life, which he "had ſo long ſuffered, nor the apprehenſion of any "thing might befall him, ſhould ever prevail with "him to conſent to any one act, 'till the condi-"tions of the whole peace ſhould be concluded; "and that then he would be ready to give all juſt "and reaſonable ſatisfaction, in all particulars; "and for adjuſting all this, he knew no way but "a perſonal treaty (and therefore very earneſtly "deſired the two houſes to conſent to it) to be "either at London, or any other place they would "rather chuſe."

Ludlow. Vol. I. p. 234. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 67, 68.

This Prince, not doubting but his anſwer would diſpleaſe the two houſes, would have given it the commiſſioners ſealed up; becauſe, while the parliament ſhould take it into conſideration, he intended to make his eſcape, having already taken ſome meaſures for that purpoſe. But the commiſſioners (2) would not receive it in that manner; ſaying, "They were not to be looked upon as com-"mon meſſengers, and to carry back an anſwer "they had not ſeen." Charles, apprehending, that their return without his anſwer would be attended with the worſt of conſequences, gave it them open; whereupon they inſtantly departed. They were ſcarcely out of ſight, when governor Hammond * put out of the caſtle all his Majeſty's ſervants, who 'till then had been permited to be with him, and guarded him ſo ſtrictly, that none had liberty to approach him without expreſs licenſe (3).

It was not in vain that the governor took theſe precautions, ſince, immediately after, one Burley †, reſiding in that iſland, who had been general of the ordnance in one of King Charles's armies, ſtrove to excite the inhabitants to reſcue their Sovereign from his captivity (4). But he ſo ill laid his meaſures that, inſtead of executing his deſign, he was apprehended, afterwards condemned, drawn, hanged and quartered. Seemingly, Charles had depended on this gentleman for his eſcape.

Cromwell's invectives againſt the King. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 70.

"That the King was a man of great parts, and "great underſtanding; but he was ſo great a "diſſembler, and ſo falſe a man, that he was not "to be truſted. That while he profeſſed with all "ſolemnity, that he refered himſelf wholly to "the parliament, and depended only upon their "wiſdom and counſel for the ſetlement and com-"poſing the diſtractions of the kingdom, he had "at the ſame time ſecret treaties with the Scotiſh "commiſſioners, how he might imbroil the nation "in a new war, and deſtroy the parliament." He concluded; "That they might no farther trouble "themſelves with ſending meſſages to him, or far-"ther propoſitions, but that they might enter upon "thoſe counſels which were neceſſary towards "ſetling the kingdom, without having farther re-"courſe to the King." This advice being ſtrongly ſeconded by ſome other members, it was at length reſolved, after a long debate from morning 'till late at night (5), That no more addreſſes ſhould be made to, or meſſages received from the King (6), and that a declaration ſhould be publiſhed to ſatisfy the kingdom why they did ſo. This declaration was very ſoon prepared (7). It contained all the reproaches caſt on this Prince, in 1641, in the Remonſtrance of the State of the Kingdom, and whatever had been complained of ſince that time, not without a direct inſinuation, that King Charles had, when Prince of Wales, conſpired with the duke of Buckingham againſt the life of his father, King James. They charged him with having openly betrayed the intereſt of the Proteſtant religion, by lending his ſhips to the King of France, who imployed them againſt Rochel. When this declaration came to be debated, it met with much oppoſition, even in the houſe of commons: but his Majeſty's adverſaries did what is daily practiſed in parliaments. They ſuffered the declaration's opponents to ſay juſt what they pleaſed, and then called for the queſtion; which was carried by a plurality of voices: after which the declaration was ſent up to the peers, where it paſſed without difficulty.

The Scotiſh commiſſioners, before they returned home, communicated their deſigns to Charles's partiſans, the marquis of Ormond, and ſome leading Preſbyterians, and early preparations were made for accompliſhing the project which was forming in his Majeſty's favor. The project was this.

p. 55.

The Scots were to ſend into England an army to act againſt the Independents, and deliver the King. The marquis of Ormond was to return into Ireland, where lord Inchiquin, who commanded the parliament's forces in Munſter, had promiſed to declare for his Majeſty, and ſeveral heads of the Project in the King's favor. p. 74, &c.

(2) The earl of Denbigh, as chief, was ſpokeſman.

(3) The King, after ſome expoſtulations for this uſage, "aſked Hammond, By what authority he did it?" He ſaid, "By "authority of both houſes, [and that he ſuppoſed his Majeſty was not ignorant of the cauſe of doing thus." The King profeſſed the contrary, and the governor replied,] "That he plainly ſaw, his Majeſty was acted by other counſels than "ſtood with the good of the kingdom." Whitelock, p. 287. rebels rebels, who were diſguſted at the Romiſh nuncio's arbitrary procedure, had ingaged to join the marquis with a ſtrong body of their troops. At the ſame time, Charles's friends in England were to riſe in ſeveral counties. The generals and officers, diſcarded by the new model, had promiſed to aſſemble what forces they could, to countenance the deſign. The nobility, gentry and burghers, being diſſatisfied that the army ſhould govern the parliament, and all offices be confered on thoſe of their faction, it was not queſtioned but the inſurrections in ſundry quarters would be ſupported and incouraged. On the other hand, ſir Marmaduke Langdale, and ſir Philip Muſgrave, who had great intereſt in Yorkſhire and Cumberland, ingaged to ſieze Berwick and Carliſle. The Preſbyterian party, being ſtill very numerous in the parliament and city, were preparing openly to oppoſe the army, as ſoon as they ſhould ſee it imployed in ſo many different quarters. Had all the projects been well managed, and at once put in execution, it is very probable that Cromwell, with all his cunning, would have been not a little put to his trumps. But of all thoſe who ſhould have acted at the ſame time, ſome were too haſty, others too ſlow, and therefore the army eaſily cruſhed them one after another. But before we enter on the manner how the ſeveral projects were attempted to be executed, I judge it abſolutely neceſſary to ſhew the intereſts and views of the different parties, otherwiſe it would be very difficult rightly to comprehend the ſequel.

p. 98.

Deſigns of the Independents.

The Independents deſigned to be maſters of the kingdom, as they were already of the parliament and city of London: but, as they found, it would not be eaſy to ſucceed in this undertaking, by the ſame means they had imployed to ſubdue the city and parliament, their aim was to make both houſes the cat's foot, and govern in their name. It was therefore their intereſt, that the power they had acquired over them ſhould not be too viſible, for fear of depriving the parliament of its whole authority, which they purpoſed to make good uſe of. For this reaſon, they were very careful to manage both houſes; knowing that, while the army ſubſiſted, they would not fail ſhewing it a deference, for fear of inſenſing that armed power: and, in caſe they ſhould think of taking too much liberty, the chiefs knew how to reduce them to more complaiſance. Tho' they had diſſembled their ſentiments with reſpect to Charles, after his removal from Holmby, they were his mortal enemies, and with their utmoſt ability bent to oppoſe his reſtoration on any conditions whatever, becauſe they conſidered it as abſolutely deſtructive of their party. Oliver Cromwell, who privately directed their affairs, had, as I obſerved, found means to keep his poſt in the army, and his ſeat in parliament, tho' he had been the chief promoter of the ſelf-denying ordinance, whereby all other parliament-members were excluded from offices, either civil or military. Moreover, ſince the war ended, he had brought into the houſe many more of his faction, beſide thoſe who had been there ever ſince this parliament commenced. Hence the Independent party was grown very conſiderable in the houſe of commons, as well by their number, as by the junction of ſeveral other members, who, thro' fear, or want of judgment, ſuffered themſelves to be led by the Independents, on ſome occaſions where their artifices were not eaſy to be diſcovered; but their main ſtrength lay in the army's ſupport, whereof they were ſecure, when neceſſary: ſo, when any leading Independent ſpake with warmth in the houſe, he ſeldom met with oppoſition, becauſe he was conſidered as the mouth of the army.

Charles I An' 1647.

But what end was it the Independents propoſed? The event ſhewed their principles were inconſiſtent with either Monarchy, Epiſcopacy, or Preſbytery, and that their aim was to eſtabliſh in the ſtate a republic, and wholly aboliſh eccleſiaſtical authority. Nothing was more oppoſite to this deſign than the hierarchy, eſpecially as it was experimentally known to have ſupported the monarchy, not only in its rights, but alſo in its moſt exorbitant pretenſions. Preſbytery, as eſtabliſhed in Scotland, and as intended to be eſtabliſhed in England, was no leſs contrary to their deſigns. They pretended, it was inconſiſtent with the civil government, and to admit it would be to admit in the church a ſort of common-wealth, which would aſpire to a complete independency on the ſtate; nor were the Preſbyterian clergy leſs averſe to toleration than the Epiſcopal. This they proved by the example of Scotland, where, under color of religion and godlineſs, the general aſſemblies of the kirk pretended to intermedle in all important affairs of the ſtate, and not only to aſſiſt the civil authority, but to be bound to it in conſcience, on certain occaſions. Beſide, if the prelates had perſecuted thoſe who refuſed conforming to the church of England, the Preſbyters, ſince their being uppermoſt, exerciſed no leſs tyranny upon ſuch as would not ſubmit to their diſcipline. Thus the principles of both Epiſcopalians and Preſbyterians being directly contrary to thoſe of the Independents, theſe latter were equally enemies to both, and equally labored their deſtruction. To execute their deſigns, they had at firſt joined with the Preſbyterians, on pretenſe of eſtabliſhing Preſbytery, but in reality to ruin King Charles: and when it was out of that Prince's power to annoy them, they labored to deſtroy the ſame Preſbytery, for the eſtabliſhing whereof they had ſhewn more zeal than even the very Preſbyterians.

Cromwell's views.

Such were the Independents views. As for Cromwell's in particular, it cannot be preciſely ſaid at what time he began to form the project of his advancement. He had paſſed the two firſt years of this parliament in the houſe of commons, as member for the town of Cambridge, without being very remarkable. Tho' he was upwards of forty years old before he exerciſed the profeſſion of arms, he ſuddenly grew ſo expert, and ſhewed ſuch undaunted courage in all the actions where he was preſent, that he was ſoon made lieutenant-general of the army, commanded by ſir Thomas Fairfax. It cannot well be doubted, that ſince the battle of Naſeby, where he acquired freſh laurels, he began to think of his own farther exaltation: but I dare not affirm, he then meditated what he afterwards accompliſhed. I ſhould rather believe, he had only ſome ambitious views in general, and was led by the events and ſituation of affairs to form more lofty projects (1).

Intereſts and views of the Preſbyterians.

I come now to the Preſbyterians. The war was ended to his Majeſty's diſadvantage: but he was ſtill alive, tho' a priſoner, and had ſeveral children. It was the nation's general ſenſe, or at leaſt that of all ſuch as were not blinded by a ſpirit of party, that Charles ſhould be reſtored; but on ſuch terms as ſhould hinder the government's conſtitution from being liable to the ſame danger as before this parliament.

(1) Some have reported, that Cromwell privately ſtipulated with the King, if his Majeſty cloſed with the army's propoſals, Cromwell ſhould be made earl of Eſſex, knight of the garter, firſt captain of the guards, and even advanced to the degree of vicar-general, as lord Cromwell was under Henry VIII. But the King, who would do nothing without the advice of his Queen, wrote to her, "That tho' he aſſented to the army's propoſals, if by aſſenting to them he could procure peace, it "would be eaſier then to take off Cromwell, than now he was the head which governed the army." This Letter was intercepted by Cromwell, who thereupon reſolved to ruin the King. R. Coke, p. 323. Life of Cromwell, p. 71.

Charles I An' 1647.

Queſtionleſs, this was the ſentiment of all honeſt Engliſhmen, when it is conſidered, that even thoſe who had nothing leſs in view than the King's reeſtabliſhment, did however publicly declare, they deſired it, for fear the contrary opinion ſhould deprive them of the peoples favor, which was abſolutely neceſſary for them. This appears in every paper publiſhed ſince the war brake out, and particularly ſince the King's impriſonment: and, in reality, nothing was more juſt and reaſonable. The nation's intereſt required not that Royalty ſhould be aboliſhed, or the Sovereign reduced ſo low as to be diſabled from executing the laws, and protecting his ſubjects: but the Independents intereſt required the firſt of theſe, and that of the Preſbyterians the ſecond. Herein conſiſted the difficulty of this Prince's reſtoration. He was willing enough to conſent, that all diſpoſal of the militia, and nomination to great offices, ſhould be left to both houſes of parliament, for a ſeaſon. This was ſufficient for the intereſt of the nation in general, ſince people would have been freed from their fears, with reſpect to the government. Had the Preſbyterians intended only the public's welfare, they doubtleſs would have been ſatisfied with his Majeſty's offers. But they had another intereſt, no leſs dear to them, and which diſtinguiſhed their party from the whole community, viz. the abolition of epiſcopal government, which was their greateſt concern: nay, very ſeemingly, their firſt application to procure the nation's good, by indeavoring to retrench the regal power, was only to effect with greater facility their ſecret deſigns to alter eccleſiaſtical government: nor had they, at that juncture I am now upon, varied their projects. They knew how zealous King Charles was for Prelatical governvernment, and how averſe to Preſbytery: wherefore they could not, without hazarding utterly to loſe the fruit of their labors, leave their pretenſions undecided, and their affairs ſo as it ſhould be in that Prince's power to demoliſh what they had raiſed; and the King refuſed giving them any aſſurance on that article. Contrariwiſe, he plainly intimated, it was with reluctance that he granted them any thing, and even for a very ſhort time: beſide, they had no confidence in his promiſes.

Moreover, they had alſo other enemies who were no leſs formidable. Theſe were the Independents, who had over them great advantages: 1. They had the King's perſon in their power. 2. They were ſupported by the army, now at the gates of London. 3. The army directed, in great meaſure, all determinations of the parliament. Thus, the Preſbyterians were extremely imbaraſſed, ſince, whichſoever of the two parties, Charles's or the Independents, prevailed, their ruin was inevitable. Mean while, as their danger from the Independents was the moſt imminent, immediately on their being informed of the reſolution taken by the Scots to ſend a force to his Majeſty's relief, they thought fit to ſuſpend their quarrel with the King, and join their indeavors with thoſe of the Scots, to deliver him from the Independents. Not that they intended to reſtore him unconditionally; nothing was remoter from their thoughts: but they hoped, with the Scots and Royaliſts aſſiſtance, to deſtroy the Independents and army, and that then the parliament would be abſolutely free. In ſuch caſe, they flattered themſelves, that their party would be, in both houſes, ſufficiently powerful to require of the King ſuch conditions as they ſhould think proper for their deſigns: the true Engliſh of which is, they pretended to deliver his Majeſty from the thraldom in which he was held by the Independents, by means of his own friends, to put him under another which would have been no leſs grievous to him; in a word, to put him into the power of a parliament by which he had always been oppoſed: a chimerical project, if ever any was ſo! It muſt be obſerved, the Preſbyterians no longer prevailing in the parliament, ſince the ſixth of Auguſt, their chief ſtrength lay in the aſſiſtance they could expect from London, and ſuch generals, officers and ſoldiers, as were caſhiered by the new model, and very ready to act againſt thoſe who had ſnatched from them the fruit of all their labors.

Charles I An' 1647.

Intereſts and views of the Scots.

The Scots had the ſame intereſts and views, with regard to King Charles. They were ſenſible, that Prince conſidered the favors he had granted them as extorted, at a time when he could not deny them without great inconveniencies. On the other hand, they had not confidence enough in him, to believe he would be punctual to his promiſes, in caſe he remounted the Engliſh throne, inveſted with his whole prerogative. It was therefore their intereſt to prevent his becoming too powerful in England; and this had induced them to aſſiſt the parliament: but with regard to the Independents, that nation ſeems not to have been ſo much concerned to oppoſe the ſuperiority this ſect had acquired in England. Indeed, it would have been more advantageous to Scotland, if there had not been any Independent party in England, provided the Preſbyterian had prevailed, and the covenant been ſtrictly obſerved. But ſince affairs had taken a different career, and the Independents were got uppermoſt, it does not appear what miſchief could thence accrue to the Scots, ſince they were no leſs ſecured from Charles's power, while he was in the Independents hands, than when in thoſe of the Preſbyterians. The Scots reſolution to aſſiſt his ſaid Majeſty can ſolely be aſcribed to one, or perhaps all of the following cauſes: viz. 1. To the fear of a union between him and the Independents; but this fear was groundleſs, the principles of thoſe two parties being diametrically oppoſite: 2. To the deſire of being revenged on their ſworn enemies, the Independents, who had often mortified the Scotiſh commiſſioners: 3. To their ardent deſire of firmly eſtabliſhing Preſbytery in the church of England: 4. To their hopes of preſerving, by means of this new war, the advantages procured them by the covenant. The queſtion is to know, Whether theſe three latter cauſes were ſufficient to ingage them indiſpenſibly to undertake a war againſt England? I ſay againſt England; for they could not doubt but the parliament, directed as it was by the army, would conſider their entering the kingdom as a manifeſt invaſion.

Contrariwiſe, the Royaliſts, tho' worſted, being ſtill very numerous, there was great danger that, notwithſtanding the Scots by their union with them ſhould deſtroy the Independent party, and their ſupporters the army, this advantage would turn more to Charles's than to the Preſbyterians benefit. At leaſt, it cannot be denied, that, by uniting with the Royaliſts, they would, tho' contrary to their intention, inable them to hold up their heads, and by their own ſucceſſes give new ſtrength to thoſe ancient enemies. Theſe were reflections which occurred to many in Scotland, where the intended new war was far from being univerſally liked. Charles's party appeared very active, which was a ſign, their hopes were not confined to only freeing their royal maſter from the Independents bondage, in order to put him under that of the Preſbyterians. The commiſſioners had ſigned the iſle of Wight treaty, without being authoriſed by the parliament of Scotland; and the execution of that treaty, on the Scots ſide, was intirely founded on the hopes their commiſſioners had given his Majeſty, of cauſing it to be ratified: but they had ventured to impart it only to a few friends, and ſome leading Preſbyterians of England, knowing, it contained not the whole of what the Preſbyterians deſired.

CHARLES I AN' 1647.

desired. It may therefore be affirmed, that the new war, for which preparations were making in Scotland, was rather the work of ſome particular perſons, than of the nation in general, as we ſhall plainly ſee hereafter.

Views of the Royaliſts.

It was not, as I ſaid, the Royaliſts deſign to deliver King Charles out of the Independents hands, to leave him at the Preſbyterians mercy. They knew that, when the parliament ſhould be intirely free, that Prince's condition would be abundantly better: and therefore, in jointly laboring with the Preſbyterians and Scots, their aim was to reſtore his Majeſty to his priſtine ſtate, without ſubjecting him to the terms already propoſed. Indeed, ſome of them would not have ſcrupled conſenting to a toleration of the Preſbyterian creed, rather than hazard their Sovereign's reſtoration: nay, ſome there were who, had they been conſulted, would have adviſed his ſubmiting to a change introduced againſt his conſent. Tho' they were firmly perſuaded, that Epiſcopal was more perfect than Preſbyterian government, they did not think the difference between them ſufficiently important to obſtruct a ſincere union of the two parties, which they conſidered as the ſole means of reſtoring the King to his right: and this was what certain perſons had propoſed to his Majeſty, before he withdrew to the Scotiſh army. His Queen and the court of France were of this opinion: but Charles was not: he was ſo poſſeſſed with the neceſſity of epiſcopacy, that nothing could move him. Unfortunately for him, he had none about him but men who, like him, believed epiſcopacy ſo eſſential to religion, that without biſhops neither the ordination of miniſters, nor conſequently the adminiſtration of the ſacraments, could be valid. It muſt not therefore be thought ſtrange, that King Charles had great ſcruples upon this point, ſince, according to his principles, he could not conſider Preſbyterians as members of Chriſt's church. For how could they be Chriſtians, if their baptiſm was invalid? This cannot be denied to have been the opinion at court, and of many Church-of-England folks. If therefore the Royaliſts had fully known the contents of the iſle of Wight treaty, very probably their zeal for his Majeſty's ſervice would have cooled. We have obſerved how highly it diſpleaſed the earl of Clarendon. It is very eaſy to conceive, that men of ſuch ſentiments did not mean to labor for the Preſbyterians intereſt. What therefore could be expected from a union of the Royaliſts with the Preſbyterians and Scots, ſince they all acted with different, or rather oppoſite views, and, tho' their common deſign had ſucceeded, they muſt infallibly, on that ſcore, have diſunited, and commenced a new war?

Charles's own views.

As to his Majeſty's own particular views, they can only be conjectured. He was like one who is drowning, and catches at whatever he thinks able to ſave him, or at leaſt retard his fate. His accepting the ſervice of the Scots, and Engliſh Preſbyterians, was not becauſe he expected from them abundance of condeſcenſion. He had too often experienced their wayward deportment towards him, to imagine they would ſeriouſly think of his reſtoration, without impoſing on him intolerable conditions. But neceſſity forced him to accept it, if not in expectation of obtaining his deſires, at leaſt, in hopes of procraſtinating his ruin as long as poſſible. For he was told, and by one then preſent, that, in a council of officers at Windſor, it was moved to take away his life. He very poſſibly entertained hopes that, by the Scots and Engliſh Preſbyterians aid, he might ſo ſtrengthen his own party, that they would be in condition to act alone, when once the Independent army was diſperſed, and by that means he might be freed and inabled to make a peace on terms more tolerable than thoſe hitherto offered. Thus, by a moſt unaccountable ſhortneſs of ſight, this Prince pretended to uſe the Scots and Preſbyterians to recover his rights, while theſe latter pretended to make him and his party ſubſervient to their own deſigns. King Charles might have likewiſe another view in ſeting the Preſbyterians and Independents at variance; viz. that the weakeſt would join with him, even unconditionally, rather than their enemies ſhould be ſeen triumphing.

Ludlow, Vol. I. p. 227.

CHARLES I AN' 1647.

The parliament conſiſted of Preſbyterians and Independents; and, notwithſtanding the efforts of Cromwell and his party, the Preſbyterians ſtill held a majority. But this party was conſiderably weakened by the abſenſe of eleven of their principal members, driven away by the army: Thenceforwards, the ſame vigor, as formerly, no more appeared in the commons houſe, becauſe it was not directed as before the excluſion of theſe members: beſide, this example deterred the boldeſt Preſbyterians. Thus were the Independents maſters; and tho' the parliament as to number was Preſbyterian, they acted however like Independents, becauſe they could not well do otherwiſe. As the army was near London, Cromwell had opportunity to be conſtantly in the houſe, where his preſenſe alone made the balance incline to which ſide he pleaſed, in the debates where his party was concerned. The peers were under no leſs conſtraint than the commons, nor leſs expoſed to the army's violence, which had cauſed ſeven peers to be impeached of high-treaſon by the commons, under color of their being concerned in the tumult of the twenty-ſixth of July. Theſe tranſactions therefore of both houſes, from the ſixth of Auguſt, 1647, and 'till June, 1648, are to be conſidered as directed by the army, i. e. by the leading Independents. It may be imagined, the Preſbyterian members were extremely mortified at their being conſtrained, notwithſtanding their majority in both houſes, to do things manifeſtly tending to their party's deſtruction: yet was there no remedy but patience, 'till time ſhould afford ſome opportunity to free themſelves from this abject condition. This opportunity was of courſe to offer itſelf next Spring. Tho' the Scotiſh commiſſioners had not judged proper to impart to the leading Preſbyterians the particulars of their treaty with his Majeſty, they had however intimated to them, that they were going to attempt raiſing in Scotland a force, to free England from the Independents yoke, and that the King's adherents were to join with them, or at leaſt favor their progreſs by riſings in ſeveral parts of England. So the Preſbyterian members impatiently expected that happy time when the army would be indiſpenſibly obliged to remove from London, to oppoſe ſo many enemies, particularly in the North. They reſolved therefore to be ready to act in the parliament at ſo favorable a juncture, and in the mean while, to give no offenſe, for fear of being prevented by the army, who carefully obſerved all their motions. This diſſimulation was neceſſary, becauſe otherwiſe they ran the risk of being ruined to no purpoſe, and of diſabling themſelves from ſupporting their friends when occaſion ſerved.

The parliament's views.

It remains we ſpeak of the Londoners, who were no leſs concerned in what paſſed than the reſt of England, and could be of great ſervice to the party they eſpouſed. In this great city were men of all ſects and parties; but in general it was Preſbyterian, and the common-council were moſtly of that perſuaſion. The army had done all they poſſibly could to diminiſh the number of their adverſaries in that council, by cauſing the lord-mayor, ſome aldermen, and ſeveral common-council-men, to be accuſed and impriſoned, for the tumult of the twenty-ſixth of July: but however the Preſbyterian party was ſtill ſuperior in number. Theſe, in expectation of the opportunity to declare openly againſt the army and Independents, ſo managed, that great difficulties conſtantly occurred, when it was propoſed to advance money for the army. The city it ſelf was greatly behind, with reſpect to the ſums laid upon them for payment of the troops. They wanted not excuſes to delay theſe arrears: but the true reaſon was, they thereby obliged the army to take free quarters, which made the people wiſh to be rid of them. The expectation of thoſe revolutions which the Scotiſh army's entrance into England might produce, made the London magiſtracy continue the ſame conduct; being on all occaſions ready to do whatever was in their power to be revenged on the army.

Of general Fairfax.

I would gladly annex ſomewhat touching the character of lord Fairfax (1), general of the army, and the ends he might propoſe to himſelf; but acknowledge, I have met with little information. He was a Preſbyterian, and yet ſuffered himſelf to be guided by Cromwell, chief of the Independents. What can be ſaid in his favor is, that he retained the generalſhip to avoid a greater miſchief, for fear, if he reſigned his commiſſion, it ſhould be given to Cromwell, as it would have been infallibly.

I deemed it neceſſary, before I proceed to the revolution in 1648, to ſhew the views and intereſts of the principal actors, believing this digreſſion would greatly conduce towards comprehending the ſequel.

Strict union between the parliament and army Dec. 30. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 953.

Since the two houſes had reſolved to preſent no more addreſſes to his Majeſty, nor receive any meſſages from him, the parliament and army ſeemed to be ſtrictly united. The council of war had conſented, that all the ſupernumerary forces, not upon the preſent eſtabliſhment, ſhould be diſbanded. Both houſes, on their part, gave the army ſufficient ſecurity for their arrears, and publiſhed a declaration, containing reaſons, why the army ought to be continued, tho' the war was over. In ſhort the army deſiſted from their pretenſion, of interfering in ſtate-matters, and left the parliament free to ſetle the government as they ſhould judge proper. Thus the vote for no more addreſſes ſeemed to produce ſuch union between the parliament and army, that they appeared to have the ſame views and intereſts, tho' hitherto they had been jealous of each other. This clearly diſcovers what deſigns the army had with regard to his Majeſty. As for the parliament, tho' the Independent members were devoted to the army, it is certain the reſt, who were a conſiderable majority, only diſſembled their ſentiments. Mean while the Independents, who met with no farther oppoſition in the two houſes, being willing to be ſtill more aſſured of the parliament, got it ordered, that Fairfax ſhould be deſired to take care of, and guard the parliament. Purſuant to this requeſt, that general ſent to Whitehall a regiment of foot, and another of horſe to the Meuſe. This was to hinder the Londoners from thinking again of uſing violence to the two houſes.

Tho' the Scotiſh commiſſioners ſet not out from London 'till the twenty-fourth of January, yet had they by letters promoted their affairs, ſo ſoon as their treaty with the King was ſigned; ſo that it was now reſolved, at Edinburg, that the commitee of eſtates ſhould meet the ſixth of February, and the parliament the tenth of March. This reſolution was taken notwithſtanding great oppoſition from the marquis of Argyle, who, tho' Preſbyterian as to religion, was of like principles with the Independents as to ſtate-government, and had contracted a firm amity with Cromwell and Vane. But tho' he ruled in great meaſure the rigid Preſbyterians, i. e. thoſe who would not depart from a ſingle point of the covenant, the combination was ſo ſtrong, that it was not only reſolved to call a parliament, but that alſo the elections of members were, generally ſpeaking, agreeable to the wiſhes of thoſe who were for levying an army. The parliament of England, or rather the Independent faction by whom the two houſes were directed, doubted not that the aim of thoſe who had procured this reſolution, was to ſupport the Preſbyterians of England, who were upon the brink of ruin.

At opening the parliament of Scotland, ſtudied ſpeeches were made, by ſeveral members, to excite the people againſt England. They repreſented; That the Engliſh army held his Majeſty in thraldom, and the parliament in ſuch ſubjection, that nothing was done but what the army pleaſed: that, contrary to the tenor of the covenant between both nations, the parliament had refuſed to debate with the Scotiſh commiſſioners thoſe propoſitions ſent to his Majeſty, for peace, and rejected their proteſtation, as if Scotland had no intereſt in the King: that they in reality depoſed the King, by diveſting him of all his prerogatives, by voting he ſhould be no more addreſſed, and by hindering the Scots from having acceſs to his perſon, tho' he was as much King of Scotland, as King of England: that it was a manifeſt breach of the Scots right, and of the covenant between both kingdoms, and that Scotland ought to reſent this affront, or reſolve to become ſubject to England: that, for theſe reaſons, their advice was, that ſpeedy means might be deviſed to ſend into England an army, which ſhould no ſooner enter that kingdom, but all the Engliſh, except the army, would join with them, and by that means the parliament, being reſtored to freedom, would re-unite with Scotland, and the covenant be punctually obſerved.

Motion to raiſe an army to act in England. p. 97.

A commitee appointed, who are for levying an army. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1019, 1049.

The parliament thought not proper to take this important motion ſo ſpeedily into conſideration: but to facilitate the execution of what had been reſolved before their meeting, a commitee of twenty-four members was appointed, with power to provide for the kingdom's ſafety, in caſe it ſhould be in danger. For this reaſon, they were termed, "the Commitee of Danger," wherein care was taken, that the number of thoſe who were for war ſhould be ſuperior to thoſe of the contrary party, and to appoint duke Hamilton preſident.

The kirk commiſſioners oppoſe it. Whitelock. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 99. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1026.

This commitee, having examined the kingdom's ſtate and condition, found it to be in danger, and that it was neceſſary to raiſe an army of forty thouſand men, to put it in a poſture of defenſe. It was not poſſible for the marquis of Argyle, who was of the commitee, to prevent this reſolution: but he found means to actuate the commiſſioners of the general-aſſembly of the kirk, who, ſome days after, after preſented to the parliament certain demands, proper to prolong the affair. The parliament anſwered theſe demands, and the commiſſioners replied. As this affair will be better underſtood by comparing the demands, anſwers, and replies, I think it neceſſary not to divide them. This will have its utility, as it diſcovers the obſtacles which occurred in Scotland to the raiſing that army which was to act in England. Herein alſo will appear, what authority the general-aſſembly of the kirk of Scotland aſſumed to themſelves, ſince their commiſſioners thought they had a right thus to confront and oppoſe the parliament.

"DEMAND 1. That the grounds and cauſes "of undertaking a war may be cleared to be ſo "juſt, as that all who are well-affected may be ſa-"tisfied in the lawfulneſs and neceſſity of this in-"gagement, and that nothing be acted in refer-"ence to a war, before the lawfulneſs of the "war, and the ſtate of the queſtion be agreed "upon."

ANSWER. The eſtates declare, that the grounds and cauſes of undertaking a war ſhall be cleared to be ſo juſt, as that all who are well-affected may be ſatisfied in the lawfulneſs and neceſſity of the ingagement.

"REPLY. They conceive, that notwithſtanding "any thing expreſſed in their lordſhips anſwer, "there may be an acting in reference to war, be-"fore the lawfulneſs of the war and the ſtate of the "queſtion be agreed upon, which is the very thing "they deſire to be avoided.

ANS. They think it fit, that the breaches of the covenant and treaties be preſented; and the ſeeking of reparation, and the beſt time and manner thereof, conſidered.

"REP. They neither find any breach of peace "between the kingdoms, which may be a ground "of war, nor any poſitive reſolution of parliament "to ſeek reparation.

"DEM. 3. That there may be no ſuch quarrel, "or ground of the war, as may break the union "between the two kingdoms, or may diſcourage "or diſoblige the Preſbyterian party in England, "who continue firm in adhering to the league and "covenant.

ANS. They declare, that this kingdom will be ſo far from making any war againſt the kingdom of England, that any ingagement they ſhall enter into ſhall be for ſtrengthening the union between theſe two kingdoms, and for incouraging the Preſbyterians, and well-affected in England.

"REP. CHARLES I. AN' 1648.

ANS. They agree to the ſubſtance and matter thereof; and remit to thoſe who are to be upon the conference for ſtating the queſtion to explain the ſame.

"REP. For not joining with the Popiſh, Pre-"latical, or Malignant party, we cannot conceive "wherein it needs explanation, unleſs there be "now more favorable and friendly intention to-"wards malignants than formerly.

"DEM. 5. Seeing your lordſhips undertakings "ſhould be in the firſt place for religion; we de-"ſire, that his Majeſty's late conceſſions and offers "concerning religion, as they have been by the "church, ſo may be by the parliament, declared "unſatisfactory; whereby your lordſhips may "give farther evidence of the reality of your in-"tentions for the good and ſafety of religion."

ANS. They declare that, upon the agreement on the whole matter and ſtate of the queſtion, they will declare his Majeſty's conceſſions, concerning religion, not to be ſatisfactory.

"REP. His Majeſty's conceſſions being ſo pre-"judicial to the cauſe and covenant, they deſire "the parliament to declare againſt them both "poſitively, without any condition, and without "delay.

"DEM. 6. That your lordſhips may be pleaſed "not to fix and ſetle upon any ſuch ſtate of a "queſtion, as doth not contain ſecurity and aſſur-"ance to be had from his Majeſty, by his ſolemn "oath, under his hand and ſeal, that he ſhall, for "himſelf and his ſucceſſors, conſent and agree to "acts of parliament, injoining the league and co-"venant, and fully eſtabliſhing Preſbyterial go-"vernment, Directory of Worſhip, and Confeſ-"ſion of Faith, in all his Majeſty's dominions; "and that his Majeſty ſhall never make any op-"poſition to any of theſe, or indeavor any change "thereof; and that this ſecurity be had from his "Majeſty before his reſtitution to the exerciſe of "his royal power; which we deſire for no other "end, but becauſe we cannot ſee how religion "(which has been, and we truſt ſhall be, the "principal end of all the undertakings of this na-"tion) can be otherwiſe ſecured; but that with-"out this ſecurity it ſhall be left in very great "hazard."

ANS. That ſince religion hath been, and they truſt ever ſhall be, the principal end of all their undertakings; ſo they will be careful, that the preſent queſtion to be ſtated ſhall contain ſecurity and aſſurance from his Majeſty, by his ſolemn oath under his hand and ſeal, that he ſhall for himſelf, and for his ſucceſſors, give his royal conſent to paſs acts of parliament, injoining the league and covenant, eſtabliſhed by Preſbyterial government, the Directory of Worſhip, and Confeſſion of Faith, in all his Majeſty's dominions; and that his Majeſty ſhall never make oppoſition to any of theſe, or indeavor any change thereof.

Sundry proteſtations againſt the war. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1049, 1062.

This oppoſition from the kirk commiſſioners was not the only ſtorm drawn on the commitee of Danger by their reſolution of levying an army. Eighteen lords and forty commoners, entered a ſolemn proteſt againſt this vote; affirming, the commitee had exceeded their power, and gone lengths whereto they would not ever give their conſent. Two other difficulties were alſo to be ſurmounted, before the parliament could poſitively order any levying of forces. The firſt regarded him who was to have the command. Naturally this poſt belonged to general Leſly*, who had commanded the laſt army, and of whom there was no occaſion to complain: but he was not fit for the purpoſe of thoſe who were for a war. That party's ſcheme was to make duke Hamilton general, becauſe he had privately declared for the King, and it was conceived he would be properer than Leſly to unite the Engliſh Royaliſts with the army of Scotland. This difficulty was at length removed, Leſly being artfully prevailed on to quit his pretenſion, under color of age and infirmities: which effected, Hamilton had no other rival (1).

Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 112.
* Now lord Newark.

Hamilton made general.

The ſecond difficulty was far more conſiderable. Before the Scotiſh commiſſioners left London, they had intimated to ſeveral officers, and others of the King's party, that when the Scotiſh army ſhould enter England, they ſhould be welcome to the Scots, and with them make but one body and party for freeing his Majeſty from the Independents. They had given ſir Marmaduke Langdale, and ſir Philip Muſgrave the like aſſurances, and thereby induced them to promiſe they would ſeize Berwick and Carliſle. Upon theſe hopes, a great number of Cavaliers repaired to Edinburg, to join with the Scots, or be imployed in their army. Moreover, a troop of cavalry, marked down to be diſbanded, had been led into Scotland by their commander captain Wogan, to join the forces of that kingdom; and this troop, by the junction of other deſerters, was become four hundred ſtrong. Duke Hamilton had put Langdale and Muſgrave in hopes that, when the Scotiſh army ſhould be in England, there would be no more ſaid of the covenant, and the Royaliſts might incorporate with them and make but one body: but the makers of theſe promiſes were not maſters of the performance. The marquis of Argyle and the Preſbyterian zealots, ſtrongly repreſented, both in public and private,

" That, under color of acting againſt the Inde-

" terians, were going to be effectually reſtored:
" that this was the deſign of thoſe who were ſo
" eager for a war, might eaſily be perceived, both
" by the activity of ſuch Scots as had never " heartily adhered to the covenant, and by the ex" traordinary concourſe of Royaliſts into Scotland:
" that even men were ſent for to Edinburg who " were moſt attached to the King's party, and " moſt inveterate againſt the covenant, ſuch as " Langdale, Muſgrave, Glemham, Fleming and " others, who daily confered with their friends,
" whereof the parliament of England had com" plained to no purpoſe: that the junction with " the King's party, conſiſting of Papiſts, Epiſco-
" palians and other diſaffected perſons, was a " more manifeſt breach of the covenant, than " what the Engliſh were charged with: that, in
" ſhort, by theſe proceedings the covenant, which " was the baſis and foundation of the union be" twixt the two nations, would be deſtroyed, while " it was pretended to raiſe an army to ſupport it,
" and even while there was no other pretenſe to
" carry the war into England." Theſe repreſentations, joined to the efforts of the Engliſh parliament's commiſſioners, who ſpared neither ſollicitations nor expenſe to ſecond them, made on the people ſuch impreſſion, that the parliament could not help ordering, that thoſe who had not taken, or ſhould refuſe taking the covenant, might not be received into the army, or joined with it at their entrance into England. After this declaration, it ſeemed to be out of duke Hamilton's power to perform what he had promiſed the Royaliſts: but it will hereafter appear, that he found means, in ſome meaſure, to elude this order, when they came into England.

Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 112.

Theſe, and other obſtacles, daily raiſed by Argyle, and the rigid eccleſiaſtics, prevented the parliament's being ſo expeditious as the authors of this project had expected. As the people of Scotland were ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed in favor of the covenant and union with the Engliſh Preſbyterians, the

CHARLES I AN' 1648.

Scotiſh parliament was obliged to publiſh a declaration, to ſatisfy them on that article: but the adverſe faction pretended, there was no ſincerity in this declaration, replete with ambiguous expreſſions, which diſcovered the ill deſigns of thoſe who were for a war: ſo, notwithſtanding that party which had got it ordered, that forces ſhould be raiſed, was ſuperior in the parliament, none could be levied 'till mid-May, and the army was not ready 'till the begining of July, tho' the Scotiſh commiſſioners had aſſured it ſhould be in condition to act by the firſt of May. Moreover this army, which was to be forty thouſand ſtrong, had ſcarcely half that number, even after the junction of the Engliſh troops. But before we enter on the ſucceſs of theſe mighty preparations, it will be proper to examine what paſſed in England.

Combination in Wales to reſcue his Majeſty. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 111. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1008, &c.

Wales was the ſpot where the firſt ſcene was opened. In that principality, were three colonels, viz. Langhorn, Powel and Poyer, who had faithfully ſerved both houſes during the war, but unhappily found themſelves, by the new eſtabliſhment, among ſuch ſupernumeraries as were to be diſbanded; whereat they were highly diſguſted. Having imparted to each other their diſcontents, they all reſolved to declare for King Charles, immediately on the Scotiſh army's entering England. Langhorn even ſent a confident to Paris, to acquaint the Queen and Prince of Wales with this deſign, deſiring a commiſſion, with ſupplies of money and ammunition. The commiſſion was readily granted, but her Majeſty's and the Prince's circumſtances allowed them not to tranſmit the required ſupplies. Tho' theſe three officers had determined on not declaring before the Scots had entered England, they were however obliged to it ſooner. Poyer, being governor and mayor of Pembroke, in South-Wales, ſaw colonel Fleming unexpectedly arrive, with general Fairfax's commiſſion, to take the government of that caſtle. As this alteration could not but break the meaſures of theſe three colonels, Poyer refuſed to obey, under color of its being unreaſonable to deprive him of his government, without paying off his arrears (1). Both houſes were inflamed when they heard of this diſobedience, and declared Poyer a traitor, in caſe he did not deliver the caſtle within twenty-four hours after the firſt ſummons. Poyer contemned this ordinance, and even defeated Fleming, to whom ſome troops had been ſent to put him in poſſeſſion of Pembroke-caſtle. As the particulars of this affair are not abſolutely neceſſary, I ſhall content myſelf with ſaying, that it became of greater conſequence than the parliament had imagined. Not only Langhorn and Powell joined with Poyer, but all South-Wales declared for his Majeſty, while lord Byron was laboring to gain over North-Wales, and the parts about Cheſter.

Inſurrection in Kent. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 976, 1113.

During theſe tranſactions in Wales, Kent was in a commotion no leſs dangerous to the army. Charles had always in that country many friends, but the neighborhood of London and the army kept them in awe. Mean time, ſome gentlemen of that county, having early information of the Scots intentions, took care to ſow the ſeeds of a revolt, in hopes of producing fruit in due ſeaſon. The Kentiſh peoples diſpoſition began to ſhew itſelf in a great riot at Canterbury, * the twenty-fifth of December, 1647. The multitude wounded and abuſed the mayor and other magiſtrates, and at laſt the cry was, "For God, King Charles, and Kent." The tumult being appeaſed, and ſome of the mutineers apprehended, the parliament were inclined to inflict on them capital puniſhment: but they found ſo many obſtacles, that it was May before they ſent down a commiſſion to try them. The grand jury refuſed to find the bill, to the commiſſioners great aſtoniſhment. At the ſame time, in that county were forming ſchemes for a riſing, wherein the grand jury were undoubtely concerned, and that made them not find the bill againſt their ſaid accomplices.

Notwithſtanding thoſe who directed the affairs for his Majeſty had reſolved to delay this Kentiſh inſurrection 'till Fairfax, with his army, was marched againſt the Scots, it was not in their power to defer it ſo long. Roger L'Eſtrange, a Norfolkian (2) being in Kent, at the houſe of mr. Hales, a young gentleman who was heir to a great eſtate, perſuaded him to make ſome attempt in the King's favor, and to ſound ſuch of the gentry, &c. as frequented his company. Matters were ſo ordered in thoſe quarters, that, about mid-May, the Kentiſh-men roſe, took arms, and declared Hales their general; wherein they commited two very great errors. The firſt, in puting themſelves under the conduct of a raw, unexperienced youth, without authority. The ſecond, in riſing before the army was removed ſome diſtance from London. As general Fairfax was ſatisfied the Scotiſh army was not yet ready, he detached Cromwell with part of his forces to reduce the Welſh to obedience, and then to march againſt the Scots, at their entrance into England. He himſelf remained near London, as well to be ready for a march againſt the Kentiſh revolters, as to prevent the like inſurrection in that city, which was moſt of all dreaded by the army. Beſide that, he had no inclination to act againſt the Scots, as appeared afterwards.

The number of male-contents in Kent being greatly increaſed, they were headed by the earl of Norwich* and ſir William Waller, and, in expectation that London would not fail to declare for them, advanced towards Black-heath. Then Fairfax ſpeedily paſſed the Thames, with his army, over London-bridge, to give them battle. The Londoners being too prudent to declare at ſuch a juncture, the revolters thought fit to retire, ſome to Rocheſter, and others to Maidſtone. General Fairfax attacked the latter ſo vigorouſly, that he carried the town by ſtorm, ſlew many of them, and took a great number of priſoners. At the firſt news of this defeat, thoſe at Rocheſter left that city, and poſted themſelves on Black-heath, hoping ſtill that London would ſend them aſſiſtance, or receive them within their walls. Both theſe refuges failing them, and they withal hearing that a detachment of the army was approaching, they took to flight, and were diſperſed; however, abundance of them were made priſoners. The earl of Norwich, with about five or ſix hundred followers, found means to paſs the Thames, at Greenwich, in boats, and join his friends in Eſſex, who were on the point of paſſing into Kent, had Fairfax been leſs vigilant.

Of this number were ſir Charles Lucas, lieutenant-colonel Farr, ſir Bernard Gaſcoign; and at this ſame time, lord Capel, a chief manager of the inſurrections, was laboring that way in Hertfordſhire. Tho' the Kentiſh inſurrection had been unſucceſsful, the Eſſex Royaliſts were not diſcouraged. They ſtill hoped, either that London would declare for King Charles, or the Scotiſh army make ſo great progreſs, that the army of England would not be able to withſtand ſo many attacks from all quarters: for there was ſcarce a county, but what was to have ſome riſing, eſpecially thoſe where the King's party prevailed during the war. So the parliament having ſent into Eſſex a general pardon for ſuch as ſhould lay down their arms, moſt refuſed it by the inſtances of ſir Charles Lucas, who was the moſt active Royaliſt in thoſe parts.

General Fairfax ſtayed in Kent no longer than was neceſſary to raiſe the ſiege of Dover, undertaken by Waller, and quiet the country, to which he granted very advantageous terms, conſidering their preſent circumſtances. This done, he repaſſed the Thames and marched into Eſſex (1), where the revolters number was conſiderably increaſed by the junction of thoſe brought out of Hertfordſhire by lord Capel. Nevertheleſs, as they found themſelves unable to keep the field before a victorious, nay even a ſtronger army, they determined on retiring to Colcheſter. This town is open and unfortified: but they ſpeedily caſt up ſuch works before the avenues, that they were not apprehenſive of being ſtormed. Here they reſolved to defend themſelves, and wait the event of affairs in other counties, and particularly in the North.

where the general blocks them up. Ibid. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1150, 1153, 1155, 1161, 1163, &c. Heath.

The chief perſons who withdrew to Colcheſter, were the earl of Norwich (2), lord Capel, ſir George Liſle, ſir William Compton, ſir Charles Lucas, ſir Bernard Gaſcoign, lieutenant-colonel Farr, and diverſe other good officers, with a gariſon of three thouſand men, all bent to ſell their lives dearly. This furniſhed the general with a reaſon, or perhaps a pretenſe not to attack the town in form, but to block it up, and reduce the beſieged by famine. I ſay this might be a pretenſe; for it ſeems, in ſuch a juncture, when all the kingdom was in a flame, and the Scotiſh army expected every moment, it was not proper for the general to be imployed in a blocade, which probably would laſt ſome time, while he left the reſt of England defenſeleſs, and was in great danger from the city of London. But as he might have good reaſons to run no hazard, it is not my buſineſs to cenſure his conduct. All can be ſaid is, that his whole procedure ſhewed his unwillingneſs to fight with the Scots, tho' he always acted vigorouſly againſt the King's friends. May I venture to make one conjecture? Fairfax was a zealous Preſbyterian, but hitherto had ſuffered himſelf to be guided, or rather deceived, by Cromwell. Perhaps, having diſcovered the artifices and ill deſigns of this friend, he would not have been ſorry to ſee Cromwell defeated, in expectation that if he loſt either his life or reputation, it would be eaſier to accompliſh a pacification, which he found to be impracticable ſo long as Cromwell could oppoſe it. According to this ſuppoſition, the blocade of Colcheſter inabled this general to wait, without any hazard, the event of thoſe hoſtilities which were preparing in the North. Howſoever this be, he applied himſelf to the blocade, which began the tenth of June, and laſted till Auguſt (3).

Conjecture concerning that general's views.

CHARLES I AN' 1648.

The Kentiſh revolters had, as was hinted, twice advanced towards London, in hopes that city would declare for them. This hope was not altogether groundleſs. Beſide that the city was known to be highly diſguſted at the army, the commonality had, in the begining of April, ſhewn their readineſs for any undertaking. Some perſons recreating themſelves on a Sunday, in More-fields, in contempt of the parliament ordinance, the conſtables of that quarter would have diſperſed them; but they were not able. The mob's obſtinacy was ſuch that thoſe deputed to diſperſe them were obliged to ſend for ſome of the militia: but before thoſe trained-bands arrived, the number of the rioters was ſo increaſed that they fell upon and diſperſed the ſuccors, wounding and killing ſeveral. This ſucceſs ſo inflamed the tumult, that mobs came thronging from all quarters to join the mutineers. Some ſeized Newgate and Ludgate; others went to the lord-mayor's, who ſeeing them coming ran away to the Tower, while others made towards Whitehall, but were repulſed by the regiment of horſe poſted in the Meuſe for a guard to the parliament. At night the tumult was ſtill more violent. The cry was every where, "For "God and King Charles." General Fairfax, then in London, with only the two regiments at Whitehall and the Meuſe, immediately called a council, where it was debated, whether they ſhould ſtay for more forces, or fall on the mutineers with thoſe two regiments. The latter was judged moſt adviſeable, while the ſeditious were yet acting confuſedly, and had no leader to conduct them. They were therefore vigorouſly attacked when they leaſt expected it, and thought themſelves maſters of the city; and, tho' they made a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance, were finally diſperſed. The parliament, having received the circumſtances of this commotion, believed it to have been very dangerous, and ordered public thanks ſhould be rendered to God, in all the churches of London, for its being happily appeaſed. When I mention the word parliament, I mean the parliament ſtill directed by the Independents, who dreaded nothing ſo much as to ſee London declare againſt the army. But as the army was not yet removed, the magiſtrates were too wiſe to declare ſo unſeaſonably.

Tumult at London. April 9. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1151, 1152, 1160. Whitelock, p. 299.

The mutineers diſperſed.

I have already touched on two of the projects againſt the inſurrection in Wales, which kept Cromwell imployed 'till the begining of July; and that of Kent, which miſcarried thro' too much precipitation; and laſtly, of the tumult in London, which probably had been raiſed by ſome raſh and inconſiderate Royaliſts, who knew nothing of the projects formed elſewhere. I muſt now mention ſome others which were executed about the ſame time, i. e. while preparations were making in Scotland to ſend an army into England, and which were attended with no better ſucceſs.

The firſt was, the duke of York, King Charles's ſecond ſon's, eſcape from St. James's palace, where he was under the earl of Northumberland's cuſtody, and his retreat into Holland to his ſiſter, the Princeſs of Orange. Thus to have his two eldeſt ſons out of his enemies power was to his ſaid Majeſty no ſmall advantage and ſatisfaction (4).

Langdale ſeized Berwick and Muſgrave Carliſle. April 28. p. 115, 116. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1099, 1105.

Some days after, Langdale poſſeſſed himſelf of Berwick, and Muſgrave of Carliſle. The parliament had received intelligence of a deſign to ſurpriſe theſe places, and might have prevented it, by ſupplying them with gariſons: but as, by the late treaty with Scotland, they were to be left to the inhabitants care, the two houſes were unwilling by ſeizing them to give the Scots ſo juſt a cauſe for complaint, at a time when they ſought pretext to ſend their army into England. They contented themſelves therefore with ordering the mayors, to take care and provide againſt a ſurpriſe, which however they either could not, or would not prevent.

Immediately on Langdale's being maſter of Berwick, all the Royaliſts in Yorkſhire, Cumberland and Weſtmoreland came in and joined him. By this means, he ſoon formed a body of three thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, which inabled him to go in queſt of general Lambert, who commanded in thoſe parts for the parliament. But he received very expreſs orders, from Edinburg, not to ingage in any action, what advantage ſoever he might thence expect, but to retire about Carliſle 'till the Scotiſh army's arrival, which orders he obeyed. The reaſon of this injunction was, that as the rigid Preſbyterians of Scotland were extremely jealous of the Royal party, the directors of affairs were apprehenſive, that the progreſs made in England for his Majeſty would obſtruct the levying an army in Scotland: and indeed it was publicly ſaid, this army was intended rather for the King's, than for the Engliſh Preſbyterians ſervice.

Part of the fleet revolt againſt the parliament, and go to Holland. May 27. p. 1131. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 103.

The loſs of Berwick and Carliſle was followed ſoon after with another, which ſeemingly ſhould have imbroiled the Independents affairs. I mean a revolt of part of the fleet, about the end of May. The parliament having ordered eight warlike ſhips to guard the coaſts during Summer, they lay in the Downs to take in proviſions, which was done but ſlowly, becauſe there was not much to be feared from ſea. While this ſquadron lay there at anchor, ſome Kentiſh gentlemen, ſtanch Royaliſts, frequently went on board (1). Whether they found in the mariners any inclination to mutiny, or raiſed it themſelves by diſcourſing them, it ſoon after was obſerved, that the ſervice was not performed in the fleet with the ſame ſubmiſſion as before. The ſailors took liberty to contradict their officers, and obey them no farther than they pleaſed. The commanders, perceiving ſuch ſudden change, ſent thereof notice to the parliament, and immediately vice-admiral Rainſborough, who was to command this ſquadron, was ordered to repair on board, and inquire into the cauſes of this diſobedience. Rainſborough, being naturally ſevere, began to make a ſtrict inqueſt in the admiral ſhip; upon which the whole equipage roſe, and ſeizing on him, put him with ſome more officers into the boat, and ſent them aſhore. This was no ſooner known in the other ſhips, but their reſpective equipages followed the example, and uſed ſuch officers as they liked not in the ſame manner. As the ſhips were not yet well victualled, they were obliged to ſtay in the Downs ſome days longer, during which the Royaliſts ſupplied them with neceſſaries as beſt they could. After that, they ſailed for Holland and came to anchor at the Briel, in order to put themſelves under command of the duke of York, whom his Majeſty deſigned for lord high-admiral, ſo ſoon as he ſhould be of fit age for that ſtation.

His ſaid Royal Highneſs repairing to the fleet, then at Helvoet-Sluys, was received on board with joyous acclamations. He nominated as his vice-admiral lord Willoughby of Parham (2), and appointed ſome other officers in the ſeveral ſhips, the ſailors having retained very few above the rank of mate or boatſwain (3). When the Prince of Wales, who was at Paris with the Queen his mother, heard of this revolt, he reſolved to command the fleet himſelf, and imploy it to the beſt advantage: but want of money detained him longer than he wiſhed, cardinal Mazarine not being very forward in ſupplying either him, or the marquis of Ormond, who to little purpoſe waited at Paris, for the performance of his promiſes concerning Ireland. Prince Charles, on hearing that the duke his brother was preparing to ſail with the fleet, again did his beſt to procure money upon loan, and finally ſucceding, went to Calais, and thence by ſea to Helvoet-Sluys. He was received on board with all the reſpect and joy could be deſired, and having, by the Prince of Orange's aſſiſtance, provided what was wanting, ſent back his brother to the Hague; it not being proper to venture both at one time. His deſign was to ſeize Yarmouth, whether to go from thence to head the Scotiſh army, when it ſhould be in England, or to ſecure entrance into the kingdom when occaſion ſhould offer. In ſailing to Yarmouth, he took a ſhip of London, bound for Rotterdam, laden with cloth by the company of merchant-adventurers. This prize is reported to have been worth forty thouſand pounds. Having ordered the goods to be ſealed up, he purſued his courſe: but he ſucceeded not at Yarmouth as he expected, the town refuſing to admit him, tho' great part of its inhabitants were for the King; wherefore he reſolved to enter the Thames as well to intercept all outward and homeward bound ſhips, as to ſupport his Royal Father's and the Preſbyterian parties in the parliament and city; he not being unacquainted with what was in agitation. Beſide, the Queen his mother had injoined him to court the Preſbyterians, conceiving it was only by their means that his Majeſty could be reſtored. For this reaſon alſo, he afterwards releaſed the cloth-ſhip, for twelve thouſand pounds.

While Prince Charles lay in the Thames, where he ſeized ſome other trading veſſels, the earl of Warwick, being well aſſured of the fidelity of the other ſhips at Portſmouth and elſewhere, aſſembled a navy and anchored in ſight of the Prince; ſo that in all appearance the two fleets would not part without ingaging: yet, tho' Prince Charles ſeemed ſo diſpoſed, he was counſelled to avoid it, if poſſible, and not without reaſon. His ſhips were fewer, and conſiderably ſmaller than Warwick's; beſide, that admiral was in hourly expectation of others from Portſmouth, which arriving next day rendered him very ſuperior. So the Prince ſailed back to Holland, and ſecured his ſhips at Helvoet-Sluys. Warwick followed him, and appeared before that harbor; but to very little or rather no purpoſe.

prepare for battle, the Prince ſent Harry Seymour to the earl of Warwick, with a letter inviting him to return to his allegiance. That admiral's reply was, adviſing his Highneſs to put himſelf into the parliament's hands. Notwithſtanding this diſcouraging anſwer, Prince Charles ſent to the earl Mr. Crofts, who had married his aunt, imagining he durſt not venture to diſcover his ſentiments to Seymour: but Crofts returned with much the ſame anſwer. Hence it appears, that Prince Charles ſuppoſed he had ſome room to rely on the earl of Warwick, as lord Clarendon inſinuates; and the ground of his hope, which was properly the effect only of his, or rather of all the Royaliſts prepoſſeſſion, was briefly this: The Scotiſh commiſſioners, as I hinted, did not acquaint the leading Preſbyterians with the particulars of their treaty with his Majeſty in the iſle of Wight. They only told them, an army would be raiſed in Scotland to deliver him from the Independents power, and that it was neceſſary the Cavaliers and Preſbyterians ſhould ſecond theſe indeavors, by acting jointly or ſeparately. This propoſal being accepted, the Royaliſts and Preſbyterians prepared, as I have ſaid, to countenance the Scots in their deſigns, by inſurrections in diverſe parts of England. Matters ſtanding thus, the earl of Holland, * who had acted a very ill part in the late war, was on this occaſion, diſpoſed to reconcile himſelf with King Charles, by laboring his reſtoration. To that end, he received from the Prince of Wales a commiſſion, impowering him to raiſe forces for his Majeſty's ſervice, and his brother, the earl of Warwick, promiſed to be aſſiſting. This Prince Charles knew, and is what made him believe the earl of Warwick was in a like diſpoſition with his brother: but the Royaliſts and Preſbyterians differed very widely in their views. Theſe latter, of whom Warwick was one of the heads, pretended not to reſtore King Charles unconditionally, but only to free him from the Independents, in order afterwards to make terms with him; and this they ſtiled, "ſetling the peace of the kingdom." But Prince Charles, with the whole Royal party, would not underſtand this difference, and prepoſterouſly imagined that all who had promiſed to act againſt the Independents, had thereby ingaged to ſerve the King without any previous conditions. Herein lay the miſtake. It is therefore evident, that the earl of Warwick, who acted upon Preſbyterian views, could not believe it his intereſt to deliver up the navy to Prince Charles; ſince, notwithſtanding the occaſion which induced the Preſbyterians to be in a readineſs to act againſt the army, they ſtill conſidered the Royal party as their real enemies.

Project of the earl of Holland. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 95, 96.

At length the Scotiſh army being on the point of entering England, general Fairfax ſtill imployed in the blocade of Colcheſter, and Cromwell in the ſiege of Pembroke, and as there were but two regiments in London, the earl of Holland was of opinion, he could not have a fairer opportunity to execute what he had projected in the King's favor. This deſign was ſo far from being a ſecret, that it was become the town-talk. It was known beforehand what day his ſaid lordſhip was to ſet out, and the parliament ſeemed not to regard it. It was not for want of information; but the ſcene of affairs was much altered ſince the army's removal from London. The Independents no longer prevailed in the parliament, and the Preſbyterians began to erect their creſts. For this reaſon, the Independents did not think proper, at ſuch a juncture, to take any ſteps which might induce the Londoners to declare openly. Contrariwiſe, the Preſbyterian members were far from offering to obſtruct the earl of Holland's deſign, which they conſidered as flowing from the general combination for delivering his Majeſty from the army. So, the earl publicly departed London, with about a hundred horſe, and came to Kingſton upon Thames, where the young duke of Buckingham, his brother lord Francis Villiers, the earl of Peterborough, &c. met him with ſome troops (1). Being joined, they ſent a letter to the lord-mayor and common-council of London, declaring their intention was, To unite with the forces of Surrey, Suſſex, and Middleſex, to releaſe his Majeſty's perſon, to bring him with honor to his parliament, and to ſetle peace in the kingdom: and deſired their aſſiſtance no farther than their deſigns were really for the good and happineſs of King, parliament, and kingdom, "according to the covenant." Theſe laſt words, "according to the "covenant" were very neceſſary, as they knew the Preſbyterians wiſhed for nothing ſo much as this covenant's confirmation. But the magiſtrates of London thought not fit to chuſe for leaders, either the earl of Holland, who was in no great repute, or the duke of Buckingham, a youth utterly unexperienced, who had only the King's ſervice in view, without any regard to the public, or the covenant: or in ſhort, any of theſe peers, whoſe principles were not any way agreeable to thoſe of the Preſbyterians. So, without anſwering this letter, they ſent it to the parliament, who inſtantly voted traitors the lords by whom it was ſigned. *

Scroop coming to Hertford, was informed, that the lords, who had been defeated at Kingſton, lay very negligently at St. Neots. On this intelligence, he marched thither in the night, and ſurpriſed them in that little town, killing ſome, taking above a hundred priſoners, and diſperſing the reſt. Lord Francis Villiers loſt his life (2). His brother, the duke of Buckingham, found means to eſcape, and the earl of Holland was taken, conducted to London, and afterwards ſent priſoner to Warwick caſtle. much fatigued with the late ſiege, and whereof the majority wanted ſhoes, &c. tho' they undertook a long march, which probably would be followed by a battle. Theſe difficulties diſcouraged not Cromwell. He purſued his march with all poſſible diligence, and yet could not join Lambert 'till mid-Auguſt. We muſt now turn to what duke Hamilton was doing while Cromwell was advancing towards him, Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 124, Burnet's Mem. p. 355.

Duke Hamilton's aim.

The intention of thoſe who had prevailed for the raiſing this army in Scotland, was, in appearance, no other than to aſſiſt the Engliſh Preſbyterians, to free the parliament from the Independents yoke, and to deliver King Charles from the army's bondage: at leaſt theſe were the moſt plauſible arguments urged to procure the Scots parliament's conſent to this extraordinary expedition: but it may very juſtly be doubted, whether this was the deſign of all that party's chieftains. Some poſſibly, among whom were duke Hamilton and his brother the earl of Lanerick, ſought only to reſtore his Majeſty unconditionally, or at leaſt without other terms than what he had himſelf offered, viz. his promiſe to obſerve the ancient laws. They did not much concern themſelves about maintaining the eſtabliſhment of Preſbytery in England, or the covenant between both nations. Others, as the earls of Loudon and Lauderdale, who had been commiſſioners in England, really intended to ſerve the King, but upon theſe two conditions, that the Preſbyterian government ſhould be eſtabliſhed in the Engliſh church, and the covenant punctually obſerved. As they preſumed they had taken ſufficient care of theſe two points, by the iſle of Wight treaty, they little regarded the other terms required of King Charles by the parliament of England, concerning the militia, nomination to the great offices, &c. But, very ſeemingly, their deſign was to deceive each other. The meaning of theſe latter was, to make uſe of the King's party to procure due execution of the iſle of Wight treaty; and Charles's partiſans, feigning to agree with the others in all their deſires, intended to make uſe of them to inable his Majeſty not to be forced to receive any conditions. Duke Hamilton's conduct, after his entrance into England, ſeems to me a very ſtrong evidence, that he deſigned not to act in favor of the Preſbyterians. If he had any ſuch intention, he ſhould not methinks have loitered away, as he did, forty days in the Northern counties, but would have directly bent his courſe or London. Lambert would not have been able to hinder his march, being much weaker than he. Cromwell was yet imployed in Wales, and Fairfax in the blocade of Colcheſter. Probably had he, without loſing time, marched to London, he would have arrived before Cromwell and Lambert could have joined forces; and if Fairfax had quited the blocade of Colcheſter, in order to throw himſelf into London, the citizens would very likely have ſhut their gates againſt him, ſince they would have been ſupported by the Scotiſh army: at leaſt, in caſe Fairfax had riſen from before Colcheſter, that town, the whole county of Eſſex, and doubtleſs Suffolk and Norfolk, would have ſided with the Scots. In a word, had the Scots marched their forces towards the center of England, undoubtedly there would have been in many places ſuch riſings as would have greatly diſtreſſed the Independents army: and if duke Hamilton could have reached London, both city and parliament would have infallibly declared againſt the army, and expelled the Independent members from both houſes. We ſhall hereafter find theſe not to be bare conjectures, conſidering what paſſed in the city and parliament, while it was expected the Scotiſh army would take the courſe I have been laying out.

Duke Hamiloſes much time in the North. Clarendon. Vol. III. p. 124, 125.

CHARLES I AN' 1648.

But duke Hamilton had doubtleſs other views; ſince, without any neceſſity, he ſtayed in the North upwards of a month. Lord Clarendon conjectures his ſaid grace's deſign was, to afford the Engliſh army time to defeat thoſe forces which were up in ſeveral parts of England, for his Majeſty, that they might not be ſo united as to obſtruct the Preſbyterian's intention. But, whatever regard I may have for that noble hiſtorian, I cannot, for two reaſons which ſeem to me very ſtrong and cogent, join with him in his opinion. The firſt is, that duke Hamilton was not a zealous Preſbyterian: on the contrary, tho' he had taken the covenant, he was cordially Epiſcopal, as he had ſufficiently diſcovered while he could do it without danger. The ſecond is, that he was the man who had moſt courted and drawn into Scotland the Royaliſts, while the buſineſs of raiſing this army was in debate. I ſhould rather think, he had aims quite different from that imputed to him by lord Clarendon: that, inſtead of deſigning to countenance the Preſbyterian party, he rather feared to render them too powerful, by approaching London; as conſcious the King's condition would not be much happier when in the Preſbyterians hands. Very likely, his long ſtay in the North, was only to give the Royaliſts of thoſe parts opportunity to join Langdale's forces, and thereby render his Majeſty's party ſuperior.

Conjecture of lord Clarendon's. p. 125.

Different conjectures.

Howſoever this be, not to dwell too long on conjectures, as ſoon as duke Hamilton entered England, he marched to Carliſle, whence he drew out the troops placed there by Muſgrave, and introduced a Scotiſh gariſon. Some days after, Langdale joined him with about four thouſand Engliſh foot, and ſeven or eight hundred horſe (1): but theſe troops remained ſeparate, Langdale being always in their marching one day a-head of the Scotiſh army. This was to evade, in ſome meaſure, the parliament of Scotland's injunction, that ſuch Engliſh as ſhould refuſe taking the covenant, ſhould not be received into the army, nor act in conjunction with the Scots. Nevertheleſs, the Engliſh and Scots made but one army, under command of duke Hamilton, from whom Langdale received orders. Lambert, who was poſted near the place where both armies joined, or at leaſt approached each other, retired in ſuch diſorder, that very probably, had he been purſued, his defeat would have been certain; but duke Hamilton thought not fit to improve this advantage. He continued ſome days at Carliſle, after which he marched to Kendal, in Weſtmoreland, where he again halted, 'till not finding wherewithal to ſubſiſt, he was in a manner forced to proceed to Lancaſhire with part of his army, leaving the reſt at Kendal. At length, he advanced to Preſton, where he made a full ſtop; the reaſon whereof is not known, except it was to ſtay for Monroe, who was coming with three thouſand men out of Scotland.

Mean while, Cromwell having reached Yorkſhire, Lambert inſtantly joined him, and they marched together directly to Preſton, where duke Hamilton lay. Langdale, who made the van of Hamilton's army with his Engliſh troops, ſent his grace notice, that Cromwell was approaching to give him battle, and conſequently it was neceſſary to keep his army together. But the duke regarded not this intelligence, believing it to be only ſome detachment of Cromwell's army. In ſhort, Langdale was attacked by the enemies cavalry, who drove him to

Next morning, we marched towards "Preſton, having intelligence, that the enemy "was drawing together thereabouts from all his "out-quarters, we drew out a forlorn of about two "hundred horſe, and four hundred foot. Theſe "gallantly ingaged the enemy's ſcouts and outguards, until we had opportunity to bring up our "whole army. So ſoon as our foot and horſe "were come up, we reſolved that night to ingage "them, if we could; and therefore advancing "with our forlorns, and puting the reſt of the "army into as good a poſture as the ground would "bear (which was totally inconvenient for our "horſe, being all incloſure and miry ground) we "preſſed upon them thro' a lane, and forced them "from their ground, after four hours diſpute, "until we came to the town, into which four "troops of my regiment firſt entered; and, being well ſeconded by colonel Harriſon's regiment, charged the enemy in the town, and "cleared the ſtreets. At laſt, the enemy was put "into diſorder, many men ſlain, and many priſoners taken. The duke, with moſt of the Scots "horſe and foot, retreated over the bridge; "where, after a very hot diſpute betwixt the Lancaſhire regiments (part of my lord general's and "them being at puſh of pike) they were beaten "from the bridge, and our horſe and foot following them, killed many, and took diverſe priſoners; and we poſſeſſed the bridge over Derwent, and a few houſes there; the enemy being "drawn up within muſquet ſhot of us, where we "lay that night, we not being able to attempt farther upon the enemy, the night preventing us. "In this poſture did the enemy and we lie moſt "part of that night. Upon entering the town, "many of the enemy's horſe fled towards Lancaſter, in the chaſe of whom we had diverſe "of our horſe, who purſued them near ten miles, "and had execution of them, and took about five "hundred horſe, and many priſoners. We poſſeſſed in the fight very much of the enemy's "ammunition: I believe they loſt four or five "thouſand arms: the number of the ſlain we judge "to be about a thouſand; the priſoners we took "near about four thouſand.

CHARLES I. AN' 1648.

"In the night they marched away, ſeven or "eight thouſand foot, and about four thouſand "horſe; we followed them with about three thouſand foot, and about two thouſand five hundred "horſe and dragoons; and in this proſecution that "worthy gentleman colonel Thornhaugh, preſſing "too boldly, was ſlain, being run into the body, "thigh and head by the enemies lancers. Our "horſe ſtill proſecuted the enemy, killing and "taking diverſe all the way: but by that time "our army was come up, they recovered "Wigan, before we could attempt any thing "upon them. We lay that night in the field "cloſe by the enemy, lying very dirty and weary, "where we had ſome ſkirmiſhing, &c. We took "major-general Van Druſke, col. Hurrey, and "lieutenant-colonel Ennis.

"The next morning, the enemy marched towards Warrington, made a ſtand at a paſs near "Winwick. We held them in ſome diſpute until "our army was come up, they maintaining the "paſs with great reſolution for many hours; but "our men, by the bleſſing of God, charged very "home upon them, beat them from their ſtanding, "where we killed about a thouſand of them, and "took (as we believe) about two thouſand priſoners, and proſecuted them home to Warrington town, where they poſſeſſed the bridge. "As ſoon as we came thither, I received a meſſage from lieutenant-general Bailey, deſiring "ſome capitulation; to which I yielded, and "gave him theſe terms: That he ſhould ſurrender himſelf and all his officers and ſoldiers "priſoners of war, with all his arms, ammunition, "and horſes, upon quarter for life; which accordingly is done. Here are taken about four thouſand complete arms, and as many priſoners: "and thus you have their infantry ruined.

"The duke is marched with his remaining horſe "(which are about three thouſand) towards Nantwich, where the gentlemen of the county have "taken about five hundred of them; the country "will ſcarce ſuffer any of them to paſs, but bring "in and kill diverſe as they light upon them. I "have ſent poſt to my lord Grey and ſir Edward "Rhodes, to gather all together with ſpeed for "their proſecution: Monroe is about Cumberland, "with the horſe which ran away, and his Iriſh horſe "and foot; but I have left a conſiderable ſtrength, "I hope to make reſiſtance 'till we can come up to "them.

"Thus you have a narrative of the particulars "of our ſucceſs. I could hardly tell how to ſay "leſs, there being ſo much of God; and I was "not willing to ſay more, leſt there ſhould ſeem "to be any thing of man: only give me leave to "add one word, ſhewing the diſparity of the forces "on both ſides, that ſo you may ſee, and all the "world acknowledge, the great hand of God in "this buſineſs. The Scots army could not be leſs "than twelve thouſand foot, well armed, and five "thouſand horſe; Langdale no leſs than two thouſand five hundred foot, and fifteen hundred horſe; "in all twenty one thouſand: in ours, in all, about "eight thouſand ſix hundred, and by computation "about two thouſand of the enemy's ſlain, betwixt "eight and nine thouſand priſoners, beſide what are "lurking in hedges and private places, which the "country daily bring in or deſtroy."

State of the parliament and city.

After this recital of the fruits of ſeveral commotions raiſed by King Charles's friends, during theſe laſt ſeven or eight months, it will be neceſſary, before we proceed, to touch on what paſſed during that interval in the parliament and city.

The Independents prevail in parliament.

Since both houſes had voted no more addreſſes to the King, there was a perfect union between the parliament and army. The army no more pretended to medle in ſtate-affairs. They conſented that the ſupernumerary troops, i. e. ſuch as were not upon the late eſtabliſhment, ſhould be diſbanded by companies, as money was raiſed to pay them. They promiſed withdrawing to the ſeveral towns and gariſons, ſo ſoon as the parliament ſhould ſetle the neceſſary funds for their regular pay. This condeſcenſion, or rather ſubmiſſion to the parliament, proceeded from the Independents power in both houſes, no reſolution being taken but by their direction, or at leaſt none contrary to their views.

The Preſbyterians rely on the aſſiſtance of Scotland.

On the other hand, tho' the Preſbyterians were not ſorry to ſee in the kingdom combuſtions capable of keeping the army imployed, and obliging them to remove from London, they were nevertheleſs in danger that Charles's party would grow too powerful, before the Scotiſh army entered England. Upon this army it was that they founded their hope of becoming once more maſters of the parliament and kingdom: but they perceived that, before the arrival of the aſſiſtance expected from Scotland, it was not their intereſt to ſecond the indeavors of the Royaliſts, whoſe views were very oppoſite to theirs, for fear of inabling them to renew the war by their own ſtrength. On the other hand, they would have acted very imprudently, had they openly declared againſt the army, while it was about London, without having ſufficient forces to reſiſt it. The aſſiſtance of Scotland only could inable them to hold up their heads: for which reaſon, the votes of both houſes were always unanimous to condemn the inſurrections in Wales, Kent, Eſſex, as well as thoſe of the earl of Holland and duke of Buckingham. This was alſo the reaſon why the Independents met with no obſtacle in procuring the eleven members, accuſed by the army, to be declared incapable of ſerving in parliament, and the lord-mayor, aldermen of London, and the ſeven peers to be proſecuted with the utmoſt rigor, for being concerned in that tumult of the twenty-ſixth of July. Theſe were the reſolutions of a parliament yet governed and directed by the Independents. But, when once Cromwell was with part of the army ingaged in Wales, Fairfax imployed at the blocade of Colcheſter, and when the ſurpriſal of Berwick and Carliſle had made it neceſſary to ſend ſome regiments into the North, the face of affairs began to change. The Independent members found themſelves obliged, in their turn, to diſſemble, and conſent to what undoubtedly they would have oppoſed, had the army been near to ſupport them.

They get upermoſt in the parliament.

The twenty-ſeventh of April, before the army removed from London, upon information, true or falſe, brought to the parliament (3), that ſome officers had combined, firſt to diſarm, and then plunder London, the common-council preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, deſiring that the chains of the city, which had been lately pulled down, might be ſet up again; the army removed to a farther diſtance from London; and major-general Skippon appointed to command within the lines of communication, and the weekly bills of mortality. It is manifeſt, that the common-council wanted to have it in their power to act, when the Scotiſh army ſhould enter this kingdom: for they could not imagine the Scots had other thoughts than to ſupport the Preſbyterian party in England. The houſe granted two of their requeſts, and took time to conſider of the army's removal.

A petition from the city. April 27. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1073.

Next day, the houſe of commons, having taken into conſideration the affair of ſetling the government, voted:

The commons votes. p. 1074.

"1. That the government of the kingdom "ſhould be ſtill by King, lords and commons.

"2. That the ground-work for this govern- "ment ſhould be the propoſitions laſt preſented to "the King at Hampton-court.

"3. That all members of the houſe ſhould have "leave to ſpeak freely to any votes, ordinances, "or declarations concerning the King, &c."

They held out ſo long, that all the dogs and cats, and moſt of the horſes were eaten. The women and children being at lord Goring's door, Auguſt 20, crying out for bread, he told them, "They muſt "eat their children, if they wanted." Whereupon the women reviling him, threatened to pull out his eyes. The town was preſerved from plunder upon paying ten thouſand pounds. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1232——1256. Whitelock, p. 324.

Petition from the common-council touching the militia. May 2. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1100.

Some days after, ſeveral citizens of London preſented to the common-council a petition, praying, that the lord-mayor and ſherifs of London might be part of the commitee for the city-militia, and that the other commitee-men might be choſen by the common-council.

Hereupon, the lord-mayor and common-council preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, ſhewing, Petition from the common-council to the parliament. May 9. p. 1107.

"That the general having, by letter, informed "the houſe of commons of his deſign to remove "the two regiments which were at Weſtminſter, "they conceived there was ſome expectation that "the parliament ſhould be guarded by the city "forces, which they were ready to do, provided "they were put into a capacity to perform the ſame, "by ſetling the militia of London, and being autho-"riſed ſo to do.

"That the lord-mayor and common-council "might, by ordinance of parliament, be autho-"riſed to nominate, and preſent to both houſes of "parliament, a commitee for the militia of the ſaid "city; whereby commanders and ſoldiers might be "the better united and incouraged to perform their "duties, for the ſafety and preſervation of the "parliament and city.

"That the command of the Tower of London "might be put into the hand of ſuch a perſon as "ſhould be nominated, and preſented to both "houſes of parliament, by the lord-mayor and "common-council.

"That the ſoldiers there remaining might be re-"moved."

All this was granted, againſt the intereſt of the Independents, who but a few months before had ordered the contrary, becauſe they knew the Londoners were not for them. Thus the city gradually indeavored, under diverſe pretenſes, to put themſelves in condition to act, when things were arrived at maturity.

Declaration of the commons. p. 1102.

It appears alſo, by a declaration of the houſe of commons, of the fifth of May, how much the Preſbyterians began to be ſuperior in the parliament. This declaration ran: "That the houſe is reſolved to "preſerve and maintain the ſolemn league and co-"venant, and the treaties between the two king-"doms of England and Scotland: and that they "will be ready to join with the kingdom of Scot-"land in the propoſitions agreed upon by the two "kingdoms, and preſented to his Majeſty, at "Hampton-court." This was a handle for uniting themſelves with the Scots, ſo ſoon as they ſhould enter England. Poſſibly, the commons believed them to be readier than they were, and withal were yet ignorant that the aim of thoſe who had promoted raiſing forces in Scotland, was rather to ſerve King Charles than ſupport the Preſbyterian party in England: but they ſoon perceived the Royaliſts intended not to maintain the parliament's intereſt. If the Cavaliers (for ſo the King's party were ſtiled) had behaved with a little more policy, and leſs paſſion and heat, they might have done his Majeſty good ſervice: but they ſo openly ſhewed that their deſign was to reſtore him unconditionally, that they obliged the Preſbyterians to be on their guard, and even to oppoſe them, inſtead of acting jointly with them, as the Cavaliers expected. This paſſion, or if you will, exceſs of zeal for their Royal maſter's ſervice, was always the Cavaliers diſtinguiſhing character, and often fruſtrated their deſigns. Some of this party, inhabitants of the county of Surrey, could not contain themſelves ſo long as would have been requiſite for the King's intereſt. They aſſembled in great numbers, horſe and foot, and came to Weſtminſter, where they preſented a petition to the lords, and another to the commons, worded in ſuch high and ſtrong terms, that they ſeemed to believe themſelves ſupported by the whole kingdom. They demanded:

The Royaliſts eagerneſs prejudicial to his Majeſty.

Petition from Surrey in the King's behalf. May 16. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1116.

"That the King might be reſtored to his due "honor, and juſt rights, according to the oaths of "allegiance and ſupremacy: that he might be "forthwith eſtabliſhed in his throne, according to "the ſplendor of his anceſtors: that he might, for "the preſent, come to Weſtminſter with honor "and ſafety, to treat perſonally for compoſing dif-"ferences: that the free-born ſubject of England "might be governed by the known laws and ſta-"tutes in force in the kingdom: that the war be-"gining might be prevented; and that the ordi-"nances for preventing free-quarter might be duly "executed, and ſpeed made in diſbanding all ar-"mies, having their due arrears paid them."

Nothing could be more unſeaſonable than this petition, in ſuch a juncture, when the buſineſs was to foment diviſion between the Preſbyterians and Independents, whereas the petition tended to unite them againſt the Royaliſts. The lords anſwered, "They "were now upon the conſideration of ſetling the "kingdom, and doubted not to ſatisfy all." While the commons were debating on the petition, ſome of the Surrey-men (1) quarreled with the parliament's guard, diſarmed two or three of the ſoldiers, and killed one. Whereupon, to hinder them from carrying their violence any farther, more horſe and foot were ſent for, from the Meuſe and Whitehall, who killed and wounded ſeveral before they could be diſperſed.

Union between the city and parliament. May 20. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1119, 1120. Whitelock.

This attempt, and notice brought to the houſe of commons, that ſoldiers were privately liſting in London, and a plot contriving by the Cavaliers to ruin both parliament and city, Preſbyterians and Independents, made the parliament and city enter into a ſtrict union. It was equally their intereſt to guard againſt the Royaliſts, who hated the city no leſs than the parliament and army, and to take meaſures for preventing thoſe conſpirators from executing their deſigns. Thus the impetuous zeal of the Cavaliers was extremely detrimental to his Majeſty; whereas, had it been well managed, it might have procured him great advantages. Could they have reſolved to diſguiſe their ſentiments, and ſuffer the Preſbyterians to believe their ſole drift was, to deliver their Royal maſter from the Independents, and to act againſt the army, they would certainly have much ſtrengthened their party; and the Preſbyterians, inſtead of hurting, would have aſſiſted them. This was ſeemingly duke Hamilton's project, and theirs who labored to procure him the command of the Scotiſh army. But the raſh and precipitate zeal of ſome particular perſons, to whom it was not thought proper to impart the ſecret, cauſed the Preſbyterians to be as much on their guard againſt the Cavaliers, as againſt the Independents. So, in all the inſurrections in ſeveral parts of England, while the Scotiſh army was expected, the Preſbyterians were wholly unconcerned, except in Kent,

The Preſbyterians miſtruſt the royal party.

(1) They were almoſt drunk, and had been animated, as they came thro' Weſtminſter-hall, by ſome of the Royaliſts. The quarrel began by ſome of the country-mens aſking the guards, Why they ſtood there to guard a company of rogues? meaning the parliament. Whitelock, p. 306. Sir T. Herbert (Mem. p. 51.) ſays, the ſoldiers firſt affronted the petitioners, becauſe they required, that the army ſhould be diſbanded.

where ſome general officers and reformades were willing to ingage. But after that diſappointment, they lay ſtill, in expectation of the Scots, on whoſe aſſiſtance they greatly relied, tho', as I before obſerved, without any foundation.

They determine to conclude a peace with his Majeſty, on three previous conditions.

Mean while, the Preſbyterians were ſtrangely imbaraſſed. The Scotiſh army was not yet come, and they were in no leſs danger from the King's ſucceſſes, than from thoſe of the army. They could therefore join with neither of the parties, without working their own deſtruction. The deſigns of all three were ſo oppoſite, that whichſoever ſhould prevail, the other two would be infallibly ruined. The Preſbyterians therefore finally determined on taking advantage of the army's abſenſe, of the number of their voices in parliament, and of the city's aſſiſtance, to conclude a peace with King Charles: but, in order to this peace, it was neceſſary, that his ſaid Majeſty ſhould conſent to three conditions, without which they could not reſolve to be reconciled to him. The firſt was, "That the militia of "the kingdom ſhould, for ſuch a number of years, "be put into the hands of both houſes." This point having been the immediate cauſe, or at leaſt a pretenſe of the rupture, they could not depart from it, without evidently ſhewing, that the war had been undertaken without any abſolute neceſſity, which would have rendered them odious to the whole kingdom. For to what purpoſe had ſo much blood been ſhed, and ſo much treaſure conſumed, if a peace could be made without this ſecurity? Beſide, in neglecting this article, they would, as I may ſay, have caſt themſelves on the mercy of Charles, whom they had mortally offended. The ſecond condition was, "That the Preſbyterian go- "vernment ſhould be eſtabiſhed by authority of "King and parliament." This condition was no leſs neceſſary. It was one of the ſtrongeſt motives of their undertaking and continuing the war, wherein they had been crowned with ſucceſs, the advantages of which they were not diſpoſed to relinquiſh. What would they have gained by the war, if by a peace they were to be again liable to the juriſdiction of the biſhops, and epiſcopal clergy, their mortal enemies? The third condition was, "That "his Majeſty ſhould call in all his proclamations "and declarations againſt the two houſes." The neceſſity of this condition is evident; for Charles having declared rebels the members of both houſes, they could not as ſuch, treat with him, without renouncing all their rights and pretenſions.

A reſolution of treating with the King being taken by the leading Preſbyterians, the queſtion was, to put it in execution. General Fairfax departing from Windſor, the twenty-ſecond of May, to march into the North (tho' within a few days he was forced to take the Kentiſh route) the common-council of London next day preſented a petition to both houſes of parliament, wherein they ſaid:

The Londoners addreſs to the parliament. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1125.

"That they thankfully acknowledged the favor "of the houſe, in granting their deſires, concern- "ing the Tower and Militia of London; and in "communicating to them ſeveral votes of both "houſes of parliament, wherein it was reſolved, "not to alter the fundamental government of the "kingdom, by King, lords, and commons; to "preſerve inviolably the ſolemn league and cove- "nant, and the treaties between the kingdoms of "England and Scotland; and to be ready to join "with the kingdom of Scotland, in the propo- "ſitions agreed upon by both kingdoms." They "farther deſired, "that the aldermen, the recor- "der, and others of their fellow-citizens, then in "the tower, might be diſcharged and reſtored; "and that, in proſecution of their ſaid votes, they "would be pleaſed to improve all good opportu- "nities in perfecting the ſpeedy ſetlement of the "peace of both kingdoms."

This petition was the firſt ſtep taken by the city of London, to give the parliament occaſion to indeavor a peace. The members, as I ſaid, were moſtly Preſbyterians, and yet the Independents prevailed, becauſe they were ſupported by the army. So, from the ſixth of Auguſt 1647, to the end of May 1648, the parliament muſt be conſidered as Independent, becauſe the votes were directed by that party. But ſince the army's removal from London, the Preſbyterians had exerted themſelves, and, no longer fearing the army, paſſed ſuch votes as were moſt agreeable to their intereſt. From that time, therefore, the parliament is not to be conſidered as Independent, but rather as Preſbyterian. This remark is abſolutely neceſſary for underſtanding the reaſon of that difference between the proceedings of this parliament, of which we are going to ſpeak, and thoſe from the ſixth of Auguſt laſt year.

Remark on the change in parliament.

The above petition being read in both houſes, they ordered the recorder, and all the other priſoners to be releaſed, except the three aldermen, who had been impeached in form, but who were nevertheleſs, ſome few days after, alſo diſcharged. They farther ordered, that the ſoldiers poſted in the Tower, to reinforce that gariſon, ſhould return to their regiments.

The city's deſires granted May 23. p. 1118. 1125, 1126. Whitelock.

Next day, the commons voted, notwithſtanding all oppoſition from the Independent members, That, after his Majeſty's aſſent to the three bills, which ſhould be offered to him, a treaty ſhould be had with him upon the reſt of the propoſitions, preſented him at Hampton-court. Theſe three bills were for ſetling the militia, the Preſbyterian government, and recalling all his declarations againſt the two houſes. Theſe bills were ready the thirtieth of May, and ſent up to the peers for their concurrence. Alſo that day, general Fairfax, having drawn out thoſe troops which were in the Tower, at Whitehall, and the Meuſe, to imploy them in his expedition againſt the Kentiſh revolters, the houſe impowered the London militia to ſend the parliament from time to time a guard, as occaſion ſhould require.

Vote to treat with the King Idem. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1127.

The militia of London guard the parliament. p. 1132.

The Preſbyterians injoyed much eaſe and tranquillity, ſince they were no longer curbed by the army: but they ſtill wanted one thing, whereof they reſolved to be not unmindful. While the two houſes were governed by the Independents, the Scots preſumed they had cauſe to complain, and on that pretenſe they were levying forces to enter England. For this reaſon, the parliament, now become Preſbyterian, believed it neceſſary to remove all occaſion of complaint, by giving them ſatisfaction, and to ſhew they intended to proceed in a manner different from what they had done, while checked by the Independents. They now declared, they would maintain the covenant, and the treaties between the two kingdoms; and to convince the Scots, the houſe of commons voted, that the three bills to be preſented his Majeſty, ſhould be communicated to the parliament of Scotland, for their approbation. It is eaſy to perceive, that the aim of both houſes was, to ſecure the aſſiſtance of Scotland; and indeed it ſeems to have been Scotland's intereſt to unite with the parliament of England, ſince it was become Preſbyterian: but, as I obſerved, thoſe by whom the parliament of Scotland was then managed, ſought not ſo much the kingdom's good as they did King Charles's advantage; but of this the Engliſh parliament was yet ignorant, or perhaps would ſcarcely credit. There was moreover in the above-ſpecified reſolution, one great inconvenience, viz. loſs of time. It was the the Preſbyterians intereſt to haſten the treaty with his Majeſty, while the event of what was preparing was yet doubtful. But, on the contrary, delay was advantageous to the Independents, who failed not uſing that method to break their enemies meaſures, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel.

Reſolution to raiſe forces. June 14. Whitelock. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1158.

As the two houſes perceived the ſeveral inſurrections in England, to be wholly in favor of Charles, they on pain of death prohibited taking arms by any authority but theirs; as being ſatisfied, they had no farther occaſion for ſuch friends to defend them againſt the Independents. Mean while, as they had no army to protect their adherents againſt the Cavaliers attempts, it was moved to raiſe forces, and oblige the officers to take the covenant: but, after ſome debates, this latter article was voted to be laid aſide, for the preſent. It was alſo propoſed to remove his Majeſty to Windſor; but nothing was determined: probably, the houſe knew not how to compel Hammond, in caſe he refuſed ſurrendering him.

Petition from London for a treaty with the King. June 27. p. 1167.

" That a perſonal treaty might be obtained betwixt his Majeſty and both houſes, in the city of London, or ſome other convenient place.

" That the Scots might be invited to the treaty.

" That ſo, according to the duty of their allegiance, proteſtation, ſolemn league and covenant, his Majeſty's royal perſon, honor and eſtate might be preſerved; the power and privilege of parliament maintained; the juſt rights and liberties of the ſubjects reſtored; religion, and government of the church in purity eſtabliſhed; all differences might be the better compoſed, and a firm and laſting peace concluded, &c."

p. 1168. Whitelock. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 139.

To this both houſes anſwered, That they were now imployed in conſiderations of peace, and doubted not but what they had done, and ſhould do therein, would be ſatisfactory to the city of London, and all others who wiſhed to ſee the kingdom's troubles terminated in a ſafe, juſt and honorable peace.

Report of the commitee in his Majeſty's favor. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1170.

The report of the commitee, appointed to conſider of a perſonal treaty with the King, was:

" 1. That the vote of the third of January, " 1647, forbiding any addreſſes to be made to, or " received from his Majeſty, ſhould be made " null.

" 2. That the three propoſitions, ſent into the " kingdom of Scotland, and to be preſented to his " Majeſty before a perſonal treaty be had, ſhould " not be inſiſted upon.

" 3. That his Majeſty be removed to ſome of " his houſes within ten miles of London."

Their lordſhips deſire the commons not to inſiſt on the three bills. Ibid.

That day alſo, their lordſhips acquainted the commons, that they approved thoſe propoſitions reported by the commitee, and deſired their concurrence: but they of the lower houſe were not ſo expeditious as the lords. They could not reſolve to commence a negociation with his Majeſty, without being firſt ſecure of their three conditions, which were to ſerve as a ground-work for peace: their reaſons I have already mentioned. Mean while, both houſes continuing in their reſpective opinions, it was near a month before this diſpute ended.

Charles I An' 1648.

The commons refuſe it.

The lords reaſons. July 10. p. 1183.

It was contrariwiſe urged by the peers, that theſe three bills ſhould not be inſiſted on. 1. That there may be no delay in the buſineſs, a ſpeedy perſonal treaty being ſo much deſired and petitioned for. 2. Becauſe it is the deſire of the parliament of Scotland. 3. The agreement upon the treaty will be the more authentic. 4. It is probable, the King, having no army in being, will condeſcend to that which at Uxbridge and Oxford he refuſed. 5. It is not the way of treaty to confirm any particular, before all is agreed, eſpecially thoſe of moſt concernment, and which will be chiefly inſiſted on.

The commons reaſons. July 25. p. 1202.

The commons replied; " That the diſaffected " party in or near London is ſo great, that, if the " King grants not the militia before he comes, " there will be no ſafety for the parliament, nor " is the treaty like to proceed: for many will in- " deavor to bring in the King without any agree- " ment, and even with deſtruction to the parlia- " ment. 2. If the Preſbyterian government be " not decreed, all will grow into confuſion in the " churches, and the preſent miniſters be great ſuf- " ferers. 3. If the declarations be not recalled, " the parliament is not in capacity to treat, having " been declared rebels and traitors, and no parlia- " ment but a pretended one, which was never " done by any of the Kings of England. And " whereas it may be objected, Theſe things need " debate: it is anſwered; The King is not ignorant " of the full demand of theſe particulars, they " having been over and over preſented to him; " and to the two firſt he hath declared a willing- " neſs; nor yet is he obliged to paſs them as bills, " unleſs all other things are agreed upon; and, if " no agreement (he being at liberty) a new war is " like to inſue."

The lords reply. Ibid.

To theſe reaſons their lordſhips ſaid; 1. " That " they could not imagine, nor was it probable, " that the party about London, who had petiti- " oned for a treaty, would put it on to the diſad- " vantage of the parliament. 2. They did not " apprehend any prejudice to the parliament's party " during the treaty. 3. His Majeſty had declared, " he would conſent to all together; and not to " any before all was agreed: and that, in caſe " there was no agreement, they were in ſtate as " before."

The commons anſwer. Ibid.

The commons, not being any way ſatisfied with theſe arguments, anſwered (2), " There was no " doubt but thoſe, in the parts about London, " would put forward the treaty to the diſadvantage " of the parliament and kingdom; being men " who had not only petitioned the re-eſtabliſhment " of the King without conditions, but had armed " themſelves, and were now in arms for no leſs " (as they ſay at Colcheſter) than to cudgel the " parliament into a treaty. 2. For his Majeſty's " ſaying, he would not paſs any before all were " agreed; it ſeems not; for he pretends to be wil- " ling to paſs theſe only upon conditions, or in " any way, as that 'de facto,' he will; and 'de " jure,' the power ſhall be declared in him; which " would be their irreparable loſs and deſtruction. " And beſide, as to ſecurity, what appears, " unleſs the grant of theſe propoſitions? For it is " ſuppoſed the treaty will be in or near London. And " what is ſaid, how his Majeſty ſhall be? Who

Much time paſſes in vain, and the Independents contribute to it. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1206. Another delay upon the means of treating at London. p. 1186. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 139.

This diſpute held 'till the twenty-eighth of July, the Independent members moſt cordially joining with the Preſbyterians in whatever could retard or obſtruct the treaty. But it was not on this point only that they ſtrove to imploy their time in vain.

While this conteſt between both houſes ſtill laſted, the city of London having declared in a petition, That they did concur with the deſire of a perſonal treaty, contained in another petition of the military officers; it was ordered, that a commitee of parliament, and another of the common-council, ſhould meet to examine this affair. In the frequent conferences between theſe commitees, the Independents uſed ſeveral artifices to prolong matters. The Preſbyterians concurred with them in the ſame deſign; for, as I ſaid, they were againſt treating with the King before he had conſented to their three bills. The parliament's commitee put to the common-council ſeveral queſtions, which theſe latter were not prepared to anſwer; and as they had not any inſtructions thereto relating, they deſired time to conſult their principals. By this means, the conferences were multiplied without any manner of concluſion; for no ſooner was one demand anſwered, but another ſtarted, and thus, much time paſſed to no purpoſe.

The common-council attempt to force the parliament to treat. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1187.

The common-council, at length perceiving, that theſe queſtions were deſigned only to amuſe them, ordered it to be declared to the commitee of parliament, that it was the city's deſire a treaty ſhould be entered into with all expedition, They ordered likewiſe, that the preceding year's ingagement * which had brought the army to London, ſhould be ſubſcribed by all the inhabitants, either by calling them together, or by carrying it from houſe to houſe to be ſigned. Nor were they ſatisfied with this alone: for they ſo managed, that the watermen and others preſented likewiſe petitions, that the perſonal treaty might be haſtened. In ſhort, they evidently gave to underſtand, that what they could not obtain by fair means they would have by force. Hereupon major-general Skippon was, by the commons, privately ordered to liſt ſoldiers in the city, to guard the parliament in caſe of any violence. The common-council complained of theſe levies which were making in the city, without the commitee of militia's privity: but the houſe declared their approbation thereof, under color of London's being in danger from the Cavaliers. They withal imparted to the common-council certain intercepted letters, in one of which was incloſed a declaration from the Prince of Wales. Another, written from London to one at Edinburg, intimated, That the King's party was very powerful in London: that there was no danger from any but Skippon, who was raiſing troops; but however, as they were nothing in compariſon of thoſe who were ſecretly liſted for the King, it ſhould be ſo ordered, that Skippon ſhould ſoon be deprived of his poſt, and expelled the city.

* To guard the King and parliament from all force, &c. p. 1196.

The commons order Skippon to raiſe forces: whereat the city complains.

The houſe tries to appeaſe them. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1208, 1210. Whitelock. p. 319, 324.

Some Royaliſts mix the Preſbyterians.

In the preſent ſituation of affairs, the Royaliſts were certainly in very great hope: nay, many Cavaliers ſcrupled not paſſing for Preſbyterians, and mixed with them, to ſtrengthen the party of thoſe who intended to force the parliament to a peace. Hence aroſe this ſort of conteſt between the commons and London. Among the Preſbyterians, many were apprehenſive that, by a too long delay, the opportunity of treating advantageouſly with his Majeſty would be loſt. They flattered themſelves that, in ſuch a juncture, King Charles would refuſe nothing of what ſhould be deſired, and ſaw not (ſaid they) the neceſſity of loſing time in requiring things beforehand which, in their opinion, could not be granted in a treaty. This opinion, entertained by the lords, and common-council of London, was ſolely founded in a falſe imagination, that Charles could not think his caſe deſperate, if the Scotiſh army ſhould once enter England, and conſequently would grant every thing to extricate himſelf from this difficulty; wherein, as we have ſhewed, they were greatly miſtaken. But the commons ſtill inſiſted on the three bills, as abſolutely neceſſary for the nation's ſecurity. While the Preſbyterians thus differed among themſelves. the time paſſed away without any effectual indeavors for a pacification. The blocade of Colcheſter was juſt at an end; Cromwell was on the point of finiſhing the ſiege of Pembroke-caſtle, and going to join Lambert; and Fairfax, after taking Colcheſter, was about to come once more and awe the parliament. Beſide this, Charles's party daily increaſed in the North, where Langdale, now above four thouſand ſtrong, was preparing to join duke Hamilton.

Charles I An' 1648.

The affairs of England were then in a terrible confuſion. The wiſeſt and moſt experienced could not form any probable conjecture on what was to happen, each of the parties having almoſt equal reaſon to hope and to fear.

The uncertain ſtate of affairs. July.

Indeed, the Independents were no longer maſters in the parliament, but were however ſufficiently numerous to obſtruct, by ſundry artifices, or at leaſt to retard the peace, and prolong the negociation. Moreover they were ſupported by three armies, which, tho' remote from London, inſpired their enemies with terror. Nevertheleſs they ſaw, it was intended to take advantage of theſe armies abſenſe to conclude a peace with the King, which could not but ruin them, if made before their forces were rejoined. They knew themſelves to be equally hated by the Scots, Preſbyterians and Royaliſts. They were therefore in danger that theſe three parties would unite againſt them, as indeed it was projected, and then the Independents would have been too weak to reſiſt at once ſo many enemies. It was therefore their intereſt to hinder as much as poſſible this union, 'till the events of the war, which was going to re-kindle, ſhould unravel England's affairs. They confided much in Cromwell's valor and capacity, and impatiently expected the end of the ſiege he had undertaken, which they hoped would inable him to join Lambert in the North, and oppoſe the Scots, then ready to enter England.

Intereſts of the Independents.

The Preſbyterians had not any army. Their whole reliance was on London: but their leaders were extremely troubled to ſee the magiſtrates purſuing wrong methods, whether by the Cavaliers artifices, or by a too earneſt deſire of peace. They however hoped that King Charles, in his preſent circumſtances, would immediately grant their demands, in order to free himſelf from the Independents, and unite the whole kingdom againſt them: but the foundation they builded on was not ſolid. Had there been a treaty at the time I am now upon, that Prince, who knew the Scotiſh army was not deſigned againſt him, would at moſt have granted only what he was obliged to by his treaty with the Scots commiſſioners, which would not have been ſufficient to content the Preſbyterians, as by the ſequel will appear.

Error of the Preſbyterians.

With regard to the Royaliſts, as their chiefs were informed of duke Hamilton's intentions, they muſt certainly have conceived great hopes. They flattered themſelves, that the Scots and Preſbyterians would equally aſſiſt in delivering King Charles from captivity, and that, when he ſhould be free, and the Independent party cruſhed, he would be able to face the Preſbyterians and renew the war, in caſe unreaſonable terms were inſiſted on. They however, with great concern, ſaw their deſigns ruined in Kent, in Eſſex, and by the ill ſucceſs of the earl of Holland's and duke of Buckingham's attempt. Certainly they were in a very precarious ſituation, between the Preſbyterians and Independents, what hopes ſoever they had entertained of deceiving thoſe former, and ingaging them to ſerve his Majeſty, under color of acting againſt the Independents. Their whole refuge therefore lay in the progreſs to be made by duke Hamilton and Langdale, and in the expectation of inducing London to force the parliament to ſtrike up a haſty peace to their Royal patron's advantage.

Duke Hamilton's behavior when he entered England.

Finally, the ſo long expected army of Scots (as we have ſeen) entered England, early in July. When the raiſing it was reſolved, it was deſigned againſt the Engliſh parliament, then under direction of the army and Independents. But when the Scots came into England, the face of affairs was changed, and the parliament not only become Preſbyterian, but had taken ſeveral ſteps to ſhew they intended to preſerve union and a good correſpondence between the two kingdoms. Mean while, tho' the Scotiſh parliament's commitee was not ignorant of what paſſed in England, they had not given new inſtructions to duke Hamilton, or expreſſed any deſire to join the Engliſh parliament, now freed from the army's domination. Thus duke Hamilton entered England as enemy to the parliament, ſince there was no alteration in his orders. He indeed pretended a deſign to maintain the covenant: but both houſes had alſo declared, they had the ſame intention. What then could hinder the duke from making ſome advances to the parliament, to demonſtrate he was ſent into England to promote that deſign? At leaſt, on entering armed into a foreign kingdom, he ſeemingly ought to have publiſhed a manifeſto declaring the intentions of his principals. But he only wrote to major-general Lambert, "That the commitee of the eſtates of "parliament had commanded him to enter Eng- "land with an army, for maintaining the cove- "nant; ſetling religion; delivering the King from "his baſe impriſonment; freeing the parliament "from the conſtraints put upon them; diſbanding "the armies, whereby the ſubjects might be free "from the intolerable taxes and quarter which they "had ſo long groaned under, and for procuring a "ſolemn peace and firm union betwixt the king- "doms under his Majeſty's government." But if the precedent tranſactions be conſidered, it will be eaſy to perceive, this army was deſigned to reſtore the King without conditions, or at leaſt upon terms very different from thoſe pretended to be laid on him. Tho' I have touched on this ſubject in ſeveral places, I believe it will not be amiſs briefly to ſum up the reaſons which invincibly prove the Scots army to have been ſolely intended for King Charles's ſervice.

He writes to Lambert. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1194. Whitelock. p. 321.

Proofs of the Scotiſh army's being ſolely deſigned for his Majeſty's ſervice.

1. The Scotiſh commiſſioners had treated with that Prince without being authoriſed by their parliament. They had treated for the affairs of England without receiving any power from the Engliſh.

2. They had ingaged to indeavor reſtoring him to the throne of England, without other condition than the confirmation of Preſbytery for only three years: as for the covenant, they had indeed obliged his Majeſty to promiſe he would confirm it, for the ſecurity of thoſe who had taken it, i. e. that they might not be proſecuted on that account; but with full liberty to every one not to ſubſcribe it. They had ingaged to maintain the rights of King and crown, with reſpect to the militia, the great-ſeal, nomination to offices, choice of privy-counſellors and the negative voice in parliament. Moreover, they had concealed the contents of this treaty from the leading Preſbyterians, and at the ſame time communicated them to Charles's chief partiſans. CHARLES I AN' 1648.

3. Theſe ſame commiſſioners had ingaged ſir Marmaduke Langdale and ſir Philip Muſgrave to raiſe forces for his Majeſty, and ſeize Berwick and Carliſle.

4. Theſe two gentlemen had gone to Edinburg, where they had often confered with duke Hamilton and others of Charles's party, and when the commiſſioners of England complained of their being ſuffered at Edinburg, they were only concealed, and the conferences with them continued. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 98.

5. Duke Hamilton, before his departure from London, had declared, he would do the King ſignal ſervice; and this duke was placed at the army's head.

6. The ſame duke had ſtipulated with Langdale that, on the Scotiſh army's entering England, there ſhould be no more mention of the covenant, and all his Majeſty's friends ſhould be indiſcriminately received into the army. True, he was afterwards reſtrained by a decree of the Scots parliament: but he found means to evade it, by making Langdale march one day before him, as if Langdale had not acted by his orders. However, when he was defeated by Cromwell, the contrary manifeſtly appeared.

7. The parliament of Scotland was called by the credit of duke Hamilton, and the commiſſioners who had treated with his Majeſty; and its members were elected by the ſame factious cabals.

8. When the levying forces there came to be debated in parliament, it was ſtrongly oppoſed, as well by ſundry peers, as by the kirk's general-aſſembly. It was proved, by ſolid reaſonings, that at leaſt the grounds of this war ought to be declared before it was reſolved. Proteſtations were alſo made againſt it: but they were eluded; whereof no other reaſon can be given, but that the army was deſigned for King Charles's ſervice, tho' it was not thought proper ſo to declare.

9. Finally, when Hamilton had entered England, he took not the leaſt ſtep to intimate he was come to ſupport the Preſbyterian party. Inſtead of marching directly to London, while Cromwell was at a diſtance, tho' he might be ſure the parliament and city were very deſirous to join him, he loitered more than a month in the Northern counties, without any manner of neceſſity. This conduct therefore evidences his deſign was not to aſſiſt the Preſbyterians, tho' he intended to act againſt the Independents.

What has been advanced clearly proves, that this army of Scots came into England with a view of reſtating King Charles unconditionally, under color of reſcuing him from the Independents. It it no wonder that the parliament, in which this Prince had few friends, ſhould immediately declare this army the kingdom's enemies, on the firſt notice of their entrance: tho', as the Preſbyterians were yet perſuaded the Scots were come to ſupport them, it was with great ſtruggle that this declaration paſſed the houſe of commons. Ninety Preſbyterian members oppoſed it to the utmoſt of their power, ſo far were they from imagining the Scots had armed in King Charles's behalf: but it was not long before they were undeceived. July 14. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1190, 1198.

The twenty-eighth of July, the commons finally agreed, that his Majeſty ſhould be treated with , with, without being obliged to ſign the above-cited three bills. Very poſſibly, the Preſbyterians were at length ſenſible that, by defering the treaty, they were laboring for the Independents, who ſought only to waſte time 'till Cromwell, who was in the midſt of his march, ſhould have joined Lambert: but it was not poſſible to advance ſo far as would have been neceſſary to finiſh or even begin the treaty, before the revolution cauſed by duke Hamilton's defeat. The formalities which muſt be obſerved in a parliament, ſeveral unexpected affairs, the Prince of Wales's arrival before Yarmouth, and afterwards in the Thames, afforded the Independent members frequent occaſions to prolong the treaty. On all theſe occaſions, they affected to make tedious ſpeeches, which waſted many days. When they ſaw it was not in their power to ſet aſide the treaty, or oblige the houſe to inſiſt upon the three bills, they feigned to conſent freely to the negociation: but withal, perpetually found means to delay it. In a word, to know what were the fruits of theſe artifices, it needs only be conſidered, that the commons firſt reſolution to treat with his Majeſty was on the twenty-fourth of May: but they deſiſted not from the three bills 'till the twenty-eighth of July; that it was the eighteenth of September before the negociation commenced, and conſequently this affair held four months, without counting what time was imployed in the treaty. So, before the conferences began, Cromwell had defeated duke Hamilton, and was marching into Scotland to prevent the Scots returning to diſturb England. On the other hand, general Fairfax, having taken Colcheſter, was poſted with his army within twenty miles of London, to awe the parliament. It is therefore certain, when the negociation began, affairs were far from being in the ſame ſtate as when the treaty was reſolved. The army's ſucceſs rendered the Preſbyterians more timorous, and the Independents bolder and more aſſuming. But, on the other ſide, Charles loſing all hopes of aſſiſtance both from the Scots and Royaliſts, found himſelf indiſpenſibly obliged to yield, in a treaty, what he would never have granted, had not his affairs changed countenance. Theſe are conſiderations which I judged very requiſite, before I proceeded to what paſſed in the five latter months of the year 1648.

Since the commons had conſented to treat with his Majeſty, without obliging him to ſign the three bills, five days more had paſſed before the manner, place and time of the treaty could be ſetled (1). King Charles required, That all perſons might have acceſs to him, as when at Hampton-court: that the Scots ſhould be invited to aſſiſt at the treaty, and appointed the town of Newport, in the iſle of Wight, for the place of conference. The commiſſioners who had been ſent to him, having reported to both houſes his Majeſty's deſires, the lords, who were willing to diſpatch this affair, did, two days after, paſs the following vote s:

Anſwer to the city. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1222.

The commons returned in anſwer to the common-council of London, that it was their intention to treat with the King; that they had acquainted his Majeſty with it; and that there was no room to queſtion but the King was in the ſame diſpoſition. Then they communicated to the council the votes which were paſſed in the houſe on that occaſion.

The Independents begin to ſtir.

All this occurred before the Scotiſh army's defeat. But after the news of that great event, and of Colcheſter's being taken, the Independents in and about London, who had been quiet ſince the army's removal, and before any deciſion, began to ſhew their teeth. The eleventh of September, two days before the commiſſioners ſet out for the iſle of Wight, they preſented to both houſes a petition, ſubſcribed by ſeveral thouſands, clamorouſly arraigning the commons proceedings, which (ſaid they) flowed from the corruption of moſt of the members. Cromwell marches againſt Monroe. Idem. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1193, 1250, 1256, 1259, &c.

Monroe, who was leading from Scotland three or four thouſand men (2) to duke Hamilton, had entered a good way into England, when the Scotiſh army was routed and diſperſed. After this victory Cromwell, without loſing time in purſuing the fugitives, who were not in condition to do much miſchief, left Lambert with ſome troops to finiſh their deſtruction, and immediately marched in queſt of Monroe. The Engliſh who were with this Scotiſh general uſed their utmoſt indeavors to perſuade him to give Cromwell battle: but it was not poſſible to prevail on him. He choſe rather to retire Northward, and always kept at ſuch diſtance as there was no overtaking him. Nevertheleſs Cromwell continued his march, and hearing that Lambert had intirely ruined the remnant of Scots, he ſent him orders for marching to Carliſle, where Muſgrave ſtill remained with ſome troops, and, after clearing thoſe parts, to come and join him, in order to enter Scotland together. When Cromwell came near Berwick, he wrote to the commitee of eſtates, requiring them to call home Monroe, and deliver Berwick and Carliſle, otherwiſe they were to expect hoſtilities. A few days after, he purſued his march towards Scotland, having left ſome regiments to block up Berwick.

Alteration in Scotland. Argyle raiſes forces againſt Monroe. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. p. 1260, 1264.

Duke Hamilton's defeat, and Cromwell's threats, intirely changed the face of affairs in Scotland. The marquis of Argyle, who had not been able to prevent the raiſing this army, and had been forced to ſubmit to the oppoſite party, became again ſuperior, and was ſupported by all who were againſt the war. The commitee of eſtates daily loſt their authority, and were ſeconded only by Monroe, who was at length returned into Scotland. So Argyle, being aſſured of moſt of the peoples approbation, levied three or four thouſand men to oppoſe Monroe, whom the earl of Lanerick had joined with ſome new-raiſed troops. They had ſecured Sterling-bridge, which hindered Argyle from making any progreſs, even had his followers been more numerous. But Cromwell diſconcerted all their meaſures, by not ſtaying at Berwick, but marching directly to Edinburg. He thereby forced the commitee of eſtates to haſten thence and diſperſe, for fear of being incloſed between the Engliſh and Argyle's forces. Then Lanerick and Monroe, being unable to proſecute what they had undertaken, yielded to agree on theſe terms, viz.

Cromwell received into Edinburg. Returns into England; leaving Lambert in Scotland.

The face of affairs being thus changed, and King Charles's party diſperſed, Cromwell repaired to Edinburg, where he was received with great reſpect. He obtained the reſtitution of Berwick and Carliſle, and, having concerted proper meaſures with the marquis of Argyle, returned triumphantly into England. He however left Lambert in Scotland, with three or four regiments, at requeſt of the Scots, who believed they ſhould want them, to awe thoſe who might be deſirous of raiſing freſh combuſtions.

Conferences for peace at Newport. Septemb. 18. p. 1263, &c. Walker's collect. Heath.

The three bills preſented to his Majeſty.

While Cromwell was in queſt of Monroe, in Scotland, and three days before general Fairfax came to St. Albans, the pacific conferences commenced at Newport (1). Notwithſtanding both houſes had deſiſted from their condition, that Charles ſhould ſign the three bills before any treaty began, the thing itſelf they had not relinquiſhed. The very firſt day, their commiſſioners preſented to his Majeſty the draughts of thoſe bills. By the firſt, the Preſbyterian government was eſtabliſhed for ever in the Engliſh church, Epiſcopacy aboliſhed, with the whole hierarchy, and the ſale of biſhops lands appointed. By the ſecond, Charles left all power of the Militia, for thirty years, in the hands of both houſes. By the third, all that Prince's proclamations and declarations againſt the parliament, or their adherents, were recalled. The latter of theſe bills began with theſe words, " Whereas the par- " liament have been neceſſitated to make and pro- " ſecute a war in their juſt and lawful defenſe, &c." His Majeſty ſcrupled not agreeing to the ſubſtance of the bill, but objected againſt its preamble, which directly charged himſelf with having made war upon the parliament, and deſired it might be omited; to which the commiſſioners would never conſent, becauſe they were, by their inſtructions, not to depart from a tittle of what was contained in thoſe three bills. This diſpute held ſeven days, and it was the twenty-fifth of September before Charles finally conſented to paſs that bill, with its preamble: and even then he did it only on condition, that nothing ſhould be binding, except the whole was agreed on, and the treaty ſigned. This article being thus diſpatched, they proceeded to the reſt, whereon were great debates, and particularly concerning religion. As his Majeſty found the commiſſioners would or could not make any conceſſions, he hoped to ſhorten the negociation by ſhewing the two houſes how far he could comply with regard to the moſt important articles. He ſent therefore a meſſage, explaining his intentions, and making them the following offers.

A meſſage from him to both houſes, with his offers. Rushworth, Vol. VII. p. 1281.

1. Concerning religion. " His Majeſty will con- " ſent, that the calling and ſiting of the aſſembly " of divines, at Weſtminſter, be confirmed for " three years, by act of parliament, and confirms " for three years the Directory, and the form of " church-government, to be uſed for the churches " of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales; " provided that his Majeſty, and thoſe of his judg- " ment, or any other, who cannot in conſcience " ſubmit thereunto, be not in the mean time obliged " to comply with the ſame; and that a free conſul- " tation and debate be had with the aſſembly of " divines, at Weſtminſter, in the mean time, twenty " of his Majeſty's nomination being added to them, " whereby it may be determined, by his Majeſty, " and his two houſes of parliament, how the ſaid " church-government and form of public worſhip, " after the ſaid time, and how religion may be " ſetled, the articles determined, and care taken " for the eaſe of tender conſciences."

2. Concerning the biſhops lands and revenue. " His Majeſty will conſent to an act or acts of " parliament, whereby legal eſtates for lives, or " for years not exceeding ninety-nine, ſhall be " made for thoſe lands, towards the ſatisfaction of " purchaſers, and others to whom they are in- " gaged, whereby they may receive ſatisfaction; " provided that the propriety and inheritance of " thoſe lands may ſtill remain to the Church, and " the reſt which ſhall be reſerved to be for their " maintenance.

" 3. His Majeſty will give his royal aſſent for " the better obſervation of the Lord's-day, for ſup- " preſſing of innovations in churches and chapels, " in and about the worſhip of God, and for " better advancing the preaching of God's holy " word in all parts of this kingdom; and to an " act againſt injoying pluralities of benefices, by " ſpiritual perſons, and non-reſidency; for regu- " lating and reforming both univerſities, and the " colleges of Weſtminſter, Wincheſter, and Eaton; " for the better diſcovery, and ſpeedy conviction " of Popiſh recuſants: for the education of the " children of Papiſts, by Proteſtants, in the Pro- " teſtant religion; for levying penalties againſt " Papiſts; to an act to prevent the practiſes of " Papiſts againſt the ſtate, and for puting the " laws in execution, and for a ſtricter courſe to " prevent hearing and ſaying Maſs.

4. As to the covenant. " His Majeſty is not yet " therein ſatisfied, that he can ſign or ſwear it, or " conſent to impoſe it on the conſciences of others; " nor doth conceive it proper or uſeful, at this " time, to be inſiſted on (2).

5. Touching the militia. " His Majeſty will " conſent to an act of parliament, for its being " in the parliament's hands ten years.

6. Touching Ireland. " After advice with his " two houſes, he will leave it to their determina- " tion, and give his conſent accordingly.

7. Touching public debts. " His Majeſty will " give his conſent to ſuch an act; or to raiſing " monies by general and equal taxations.

8. He propoſeth; " That he may have liberty " forthwith to come to Weſtminſter, and be re- " ſtored to a condition of freedom and ſafety (a " thing which he ſhall never deny to any of his " ſubjects) and to the poſſeſſion of his lands and " revenues; and that an act of oblivion and indemnity may pass, to extend to all persons, for "all matters relating to the late differences; which "being agreed by his two houses of parliament, "his Majesty will be ready to make these his con- "cessions binding, by giving them the force of "laws by his royal assent (1).

Remark on these offers.

If these offers, touching religion are considered with respect to the King's private opinion, they may be said to be great condescensions, perhaps greater than his conscience allowed; since it was his real belief, there was no true church without prelates. But if these same offers are considered, with regard to the Presbyterians and Independents, of whom the parliament consisted, they will be found not any way satisfactory: being only a sort of interim, which tended to make them lose the present opportunity of utterly abolishing Episcopacy.

Another remark.

I cannot forbear making another remark on this occasion. The King artfully indeavored so to order it, that his own propositions should be treated on, which the parliament had constantly refused; so apprehensive were they of the usual ambiguities and restrictions in this Prince's papers, and whereof we even here see a fresh instance, in the first article concerning religion: but he was disappointed now, as he has been at other times. The parliament, without taking notice of his offers (2), ordered the Commissioners to proceed conformably to their instructions only.

Charles's offers rejected. Rushworth, Vol. VII. p. 1282. p. 1286, 1287. Whitelock.

His Majesty hereupon delivered to the commissioners a paper, containing the reasons, why he could not consent to the abolition of Episcopacy, which he conceived (said he) to be of Apostolical institution. As to the sale of church-lands, he affirmed it to be real sacrilege; beside that, at his coronation, he had sworn to maintain the rights of the clergy. All these reasons, with many more which might have been added, signified nothing to the commissioners, who had no power to relax on any point: all they could do, was to send them to the parliament, and attend their orders. But, this delayed the treaty's conclusion, and consumed that time which both King and parliament equally ought to have improved.

Charles consents to the militia-article. Idem. p. 342. Rushworth, Vol. VII. p. 1291.

A few days after, his Majesty, desirous to gain the good-will of both houses, and some concession in favor of Episcopacy, which was the principal, if not indeed the only point which hindered the treaty from being concluded, declared to the commissioners, "That he consented for the setling the mi- "litia, by sea and land, in the parliament's hands "for twenty years, and for confirming, for three "years, by act of parliament, the Form of church- "government, and Directory for worship presented "to him. But he added, that he was not satisfied "in his conscience, nor could be content to the "utter abolishing of Episcopacy; the substance "whereof he conceived to consist in the power of "ordination and jurisdiction, as they were exer- "cised by the Apostles themselves, and others by "authority derived from them, superior to pres- "byters and deacons in the primitive times. His "resolution being to comply with his two houses, "for the alteration and regulating of the present "hierarchy and government, so as Episcopacy, "reduced to the primitive usage, might be setled "and continued in the church of England: and, if "his two houses should so advise, his Majesty "would be content to lessen the extent, and mul- "tiply the number of the dioceses.

"As to the exception, that his Majesty had not "expressed his consent for setling bishops lands "upon trustees, and for the sale of those lands; "it was true he had not, to alienate the inheri- "tance of those lands, and herein he believed he "had the concurrent opinions of many divines "who, in other points, differed much among "themselves: but his former answer containing a "large offer of satisfaction to all those who had "purchased, or disbursed monies upon those lands, "he hoped that answer would be satisfactory to his "two houses.

CHARLES I AN' 1648.

"For the calling and siting of the assembly of "divines, his Majesty would assent as was desired.

"That his Majesty would confirm the pub- "lic use of the Directory in all churches and "chapels, as was desired in the proposition, and "would consent to the repeal of so much of "all statutes as only concerned the book of "Common-prayer, and also the taking the same "away out of all churches and chapels; pro- "vided that the use thereof might be continued "in his Majesty's chapel, for himself and his "household: and that the same should be con- "firmed, by act of parliament, for three years; "provided only, that a consultation in the mean "time be had with the assembly of divines, in "such a manner, and for the purposes as were, "in his former answer, expressed.

"Touching the articles of religion; his Majesty "professed, he had not had time, since they were "delivered to him, to look into them with that de- "liberation which was requisite before he bound "himself up and his subjects in matter of faith and "doctrine; and therefore desired that part of the "proposition might be respited by his two houses: "but he would consent to an act for the better "observation of the Lord's-day; as also to pre- "vent the saying of Mass.

"Lastly, concerning the covenant, and the or- "dinance concerning the same, his Majesty's an- "swer was; That, he being not satisfied to take "it, or to impose it on others, he conceived his "two houses would not insist upon it at that time; "and rather, because the ends thereof would be "obtained by the agreement, if happily concluded."

Some days after, the two houses received advice from their commissioners, that his Majesty had fully consented to the proposition concerning Ireland. p. 1293.

By a letter, which came the seventeenth of October, they learned that Prince's having also agreed to the propositions concerning public debts, and for taking away all honors and titles confered since the twentieth of May, 1642.

By another of the eighteenth, they found that, concerning delinquents, he offered;

Charles's proposals, concerning delinquents. p. 1299. Whitelock.

"That all persons, who had any hand in the "ploting, designing, or assisting the rebellion in "Ireland, should expect no pardon, as was ex- "pressed in the first branch of the proposition. As to "all other propositions, his Majesty could not con- "sent thereunto, as was proposed, otherwise than in "the following manner: viz. as for all other persons "comprised in the said first branch, his Majesty, "for satisfaction of his two houses, would give "way, that they might moderately compound for "their estates, and desired they might be admited "to the same; and for removing distrust and in- "terruptions of the public setlements, his Ma- "jesty would consent as followeth: That such of "them as the two houses of parliament would insist "on, should not be admited to his councils, and be "restrained from coming to court, at such distance "as both houses shall think fit, and should not

The conferences prolonged a week. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1299.

The time fixed for this treaty's continuance being near expired, and nothing ſetled on the article of epiſcopacy, which was properly the ſole point whereon difficulties occurred, the two houſes deviſed this expedient to prolong the negociation for another week; viz. by ordering, that neither Sundays nor Faſts ſhould be accounted part of the forty days alloted for the conferences.

New offers from the King touching epiſcopacy. p. 1301. Whitelock.

The twenty-firſt of October, Charles ſent to both houſes a freſh meſſage concerning epiſcopacy. Cromwell was on the road to join the army, and it was to be feared, if the treaty was not concluded before his arrival, he would raiſe invincible obſtacles. That Prince knew the man ſufficiently, to believe there was no good to be expected from him. His Majeſty was therefore of opinion, that, to haſten the treaty's concluſion, to which the affair of epiſcopacy was the grand obſtacle, he ought to make ſome farther conceſſions on that point. Wherefore he, by this meſſage, acquainted the two houſes:

" 1. That he conſented to the aboliſhing of " archbiſhops, chancellors, deans and chapters,
" &c. and the whole hierarchy, except biſhops.

" 2. That, for three years, no other but Preſ-
" byterian government ſhould be uſed, and the " exerciſe of Epiſcopal government ſhould be wholly " ſuſpended, during that time.

" 3. Whereas Epiſcopal juriſdiction, if no other
" had been agreed upon in the mean time, might " have riſen up after the three years, he now ex-
" preſſed his conſent, that none ſhould be exerciſed
" after that time ot her than ordination, which was re-
" ſtrained to the counſel and aſſiſtance of preſbyters,
" but ſuch and in ſuch manner as ſhould be agreed
" by him and his two houſes: whereby, until ſuch
" agreement, or, if it was not otherwiſe agreed,
" Epiſcopal juriſdiction was wholly laid aſide."

Charles's farther conceſſions.

His Majeſty, alſo that day, conſented to the following propoſitions:

" To that for nomination of the great officers of " the kingdom, to be by both houſes, during the " term of ten years.

" To thoſe concerning the city of London, and " the great ſeal.

" To that concerning the court of Wards, &c. a " recompenſe being aſſured to his Majeſty of one " hundred thouſand pounds per annum to him,
" his heirs and ſucceſſors, in lieu of the court of
" Wards."

He refuſes to give up epiſcopacy. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1302, 1303.

The commiſſioners telling his Majeſty, that his anſwer concerning epiſcopacy would not be ſatisfactory to the two houſes, and earneſtly preſſing him to give them one fuller, he told them in writing, he could not abſolutely relinquiſh epiſcopacy. He repeated his offers on that head, adding only; " That " if, in the ſpace of three years, he was convinced, " that the function of biſhops was not agree-
" able to the word of God, or that Chriſt com" manded any other government, he would moſt
" chearfully imbrace it: but 'till he was ſo con" vinced, he believed himſelf bound in conſcience
" to maintain epiſcopacy."

The parliament not ſatisfied with his offers.

The commons imployed four or five days in debates upon Charles's offers and anſwers, and voted them unſatisfactory, as to the point of epiſcopacy, the lords concurring with them.

CHARLES I An' 1648.

The like was voted concerning his anſwer about taking the covenant, and aboliſhing Popery, for that he deſired to have it tolerated in the Queen's chapel and family. Both houſes were likewiſe diſſatisfied with the anſwers about alienating biſhops lands, and ſale of deans and chapters, and concerning delinquents. Thus did a pacification ſeem remoter than ever, eſpecially as their lordſhips concurred with the commons in the alienation of church-lands.

New demand to the King about Ireland. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1309.

As the term limited for theſe conferences was about to expire, the ſaid reſolutions were ſpeedily ſent to the commiſſioners, with orders to demand his Majeſty's final and poſitive anſwer, and by a ſpecial meſſage the commons alſo deſired of him, that he would be pleaſed to declare expreſly againſt the Iriſh rebellion, and the ceſſation concluded with thoſe rebels, and forbid the marquis of Ormond's joining his forces with the Iriſh Papiſts to make war upon the Proteſtants. But as there remained only three days, which was not a ſufficient time to procure Charles's anſwer, their lordſhips prevailed with the commiſſioners to prolong the treaty two weeks more, and the rather, as his Majeſty had deſired to confer with dr. Uſher, archbiſhop of Armagh, and the biſhops of Worceſter and Rocheſter, concerning eccleſiaſtical affairs: but, as much was not to be expected from this prolongation, the commiſſioners were allowed to return to the parliament, leaving three of their number to receive his Majeſty's definitive anſwer (1). Twelve of the commiſſioners, ariving at London, reported to both houſes King Charles's final anſwer, which had been delivered to them the ninth of November, and was to this purport: viz.

The treaty prolonged fourteen days. p. 1315, 1316. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 171.

The commiſſioners report of his Majeſty's laſt anſwer. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1321.

" That his conceſſions had been miſappre" hended, and that he did not intend to make any " more new biſhops during the term of three " years.

" That whereas it might be objected, That in " the end of three years the power of ordination
" ſhould be practiſed in the old manner as for" merly, that is, the biſhops ſhould be at liberty " to call what preſbyters they would to aſſiſt in
" ordaining, but were not bound to their counſel
" or conſent, his Majeſty did now intend and con-
" ſent, that biſhops ſhould not receive any into " holy orders, without conſent of a limited num" ber of Preſbyterians, to be choſen in ſuch man" ner, as ſhould be agreed on, by his Majeſty and " his two houſes, for that purpoſe.

" That his Majeſty did not intend that, after " the end of three years, no certain way ſhould
" be ſetled concerning eccleſiaſtical government;
" for that his Majeſty did purpoſe, during the " three years, to have a conſultation with the aſ-
" ſembly of divines, twenty being added of his " nomination, which if his two houſes ſhould re-
" ſolve to entertain, it could not well be doubted
" but, upon the debate, ſuch a government would " be agreed on, by his Majeſty and his two houſes,
" as ſhould be beſt for the peace of the church,
" and moſt proper to prevent thoſe diſtractions
" which his two houſes apprehended might inſue.

" As to that part of the propoſition concerning
" the book of Common-Prayer; for the ſatisfac-
" tion of his two houſes, that he would not inſiſt
" upon any proviſion for continuance of the ſame
" in his Majeſty's chapel, for himſelf and his " houſhold: nevertheleſs his Majeſty declared, that " he intended to uſe ſome other ſet form of di" vine ſervice.

" As to their requeſt, that an act be paſſed for

" a ſtricter courſe to prevent the ſaying and hear" ing of Maſs in the court, or any part of the " kingdom, or in Ireland, his Majeſty would con-

" As to all other particulars, mentioned in the " parliament's paper, he refered himſelf to his for" mer anſwers."

Concluding, " That, ſince he had, by his con-
" ceſſions, brought all differences concerning the " church into ſo narrow a compaſs, that the chief " viſible obſtruction was that, wherein really, in " conſcience, he was not ſatisfied, he hoped his two " houſes would not put farther preſſures of ſo ten-
" der a nature upon him."

Wherewith the parliament are not ſatisfied. Nov. 11. p. 1323.

All this was not capable to induce the commons to deſiſt from the leaſt of their pretenſions. They voted, that his Majeſty's anſwers concerning the Church, Form of Prayer, hearing and ſaying Maſs, were unſatisfactory; and ordered the three commiſſioners attending the King to inform him of theſe votes, and preſs him for his concluſive anſwer.

As the parliament had not hitherto taken any notice of Charles's propoſitions or deſires, the houſe of commons finally took them into conſideration, and paſſed the following votes:

Votes upon the King's deſires. Nov. 13, 14. p. 1327.

" 1. That his Majeſty's coming to London ſhall
" be with freedom, ſafety and honor, ſo ſoon
" as the conceſſions of the treaty are concluded
" and agreed.

" 2. That his Majeſty ſhall have his lands and " revenues (what is legally his) made good to " him, according to the laws of the kingdom.

" 3. What his Majeſty ſhall paſs away of his " legal rights, he ſhall have allowance for in com-
" penſation thereof.

" 4. That an act of oblivion be preſented to " his Majeſty, to be paſſed, with ſuch limitations as
" ſhall be agreed on by both houſes of parliament."

It is certain, there was never any difficulty, either about his Majeſty's return, reſtitution of his revenues, or aboliſhing the court of Wards, inſtead of which latter he was to have a hundred thouſand pounds annually. Theſe three articles were conſidered as a natural conſequence of the treaty's concluſion. But with regard to the act of oblivion, the King and parliament agreed not. Theſe latter inſiſted on excepting from pardon a certain number of delinquents, i. e. of thoſe who had ſerved his Majeſty, and were conſidered as authors of the troubles: they intended to confiſcate their eſtates, and baniſh them the realm. Finally, after long debates, the number of excepted perſons was reduced to ſeven, about whom the two houſes did not agree (1): nay, as to thoſe who were to be included in the pardon, the parliament pretended to inflict pecuniary puniſhment on them, and had ranked them under various claſſes, according to which, ſome were to forfeit one half of their eſtates, others a third, others a fourth, and had aſſigned the money thence ariſing towards diſcharging public debts. Contrariwiſe, Charles pretended, that all, without exception, ſhould have the benefit of this act of oblivion. He conſented only, that ſome of thoſe whom the parliament termed delinquents, i. e. his faithful ſervants, ſhould be liable to a moderate compoſition; a general expreſſion, whereon many diſputes would have ariſen, had the matter come to be diſcuſſed. Howſoever it be, this important article was not yet adjuſted: but it would not have been impoſſible to find expedients to ſatisfy both King and parliament, had not the difficulties touching religion obſtructed the treaty's concluſion; on which ſubject I cannot forbear making two remarks.

Charles I An' 1648.

Remarks on the difficulties with reſpect to religion.

The firſt is, that if the commons inſiſted ſo long upon ſigning the three bills, it was becauſe they knew how inflexible King Charles was in the point of Epiſcopacy, and deſpaired of concluding a treaty with him, except he previouſly granted this article, upon which they were no leſs inflexible than he, as in the conferences manifeſtly appeared. This was the main point, without which perhaps there would have been no war, and whence the Preſbyterians could not recede, without loſing the fruit of all their labors and ſucceſſes againſt his Majeſty.

My ſecond obſervation is, that the Epiſcopalian zealots had, in theſe conferences, room to ſee what prejudice their former rigid and exceſſive ſeverity againſt Preſbytery now brought them, ſince it was not poſſible to find any other way than the abolition of Epiſcopacy to content the Preſbyterians. Theſe latter, by long experience, knowing King Charles's ſiniſter intentions towards them, judged they could not truſt to conceſſions extorted from him by neceſſity, and were not to be ſatisfied ſo long as even the name of biſhop ſubſiſted. They were apprehenſive, and perhaps very juſtly, that the prelatical function, tho' reduced to almoſt nothing by Charles's offers, would ſtill be a foundation whereon that Prince intended to raiſe the ſuperſtructure of his beloved hierarchy; a reſerve which plainly ſhewed, that his meaning was not to leave the fabric in its then condition. The example of what happened in Scotland had confirmed their fears and jealouſies. In that kingdom, all the epiſcopal functions had been aboliſhed: biſhops had retained only the bare name, with ſome temporal privileges, utterly deſtitute of authority or juriſdiction; but even this had ſufficed to give King James occaſion to reſtore them to all the rights they had injoyed before the reformation. His ſon, King Charles, might intend to do the very ſame in England; and the Preſbyterians but too well remembered, even at the time when he granted the Scots their required extirpation of Epiſcopacy, he wrote to the Scotiſh prelates, that it was only thro' compulſion, and 'till he ſhould have opportunity to reſtore the church to her former ſplendor. Without this prejudice of the Preſbyterians, without this want of confidence, whereof King Charles may be affirmed to have been himſelf the cauſer, it is certain his offers with regard to Epiſcopacy might have ſerved for foundation to a peace, as the parliament, when too late, frankly acknowledged. Mean while the two houſes, not deſpairing to bring this Prince intirely to their terms, continued the treaty a week longer.

A farther prolongation of the treaty. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1330.

While both houſes where buſied in what related to this treaty, the army officers, whoſe head-quarters were then at Windſor, met in a council of war, to labor againſt all accommodation. They were no ſtrangers to what had paſſed at Newport, and knew that the treaty's concluſion depended but on a ſingle point, which they queſtioned not Charles would finally concede: wherefore they reſolved to hinder the concluſion forcibly. Cromwell was not yet come to the army, but remained about Pontefract, to order the ſiege of that place, which had been ſurpriſed by the Royaliſts, and their gariſon kept in awe the whole country, and commited great violences. Colonel Rainſborough had been detached from the army, to command at this ſiege; but had been ſurpriſed in a neighboring town by a party of the garison, who had killed him, not having been able to carry him off(1). Cromwell had ever loved and esteemed him, and therefore earnestly wished to revenge his death; beside that he was importuned by the Yorkshire commitee, to imploy the forces he was leading from Scotland, for the reduction of this place. This had detained him some time in those quarters: but as he wanted not all his troops for that siege, because he had there already a detachment of the army, he dispatched away part of his forces to join general Fairfax. This reinforcement being arrived, the army believed themselves able to execute their resolves. To that purpose, the eighteenth of November, which would have been the last day of the Newport conferences, had not both houses continued them a week longer, colonel Ewers, attended with some officers, presented, in the army's name, a remonstrance to the commons, which manifestly discovered the Independent faction's designs. The army's desires were in substance as follows: viz.

He sends part of his forces to the general.

Remonstrance of the army. Nov. 20. Rushworth, Vol. VII. p. 1330. Whitelock.

" 1. That the King be brought to justice, as " the capital cause of all the evils in the kingdom, " and of so much blood being shed.

" 2. That a timely and peremptory day be set for " the Prince of Wales and duke of York, to come " in and surrender themselves; if not, that they " be declared incapable of government, or any " right in England, and stand exiled for ever as " traitors; and if they render themselves by the " time, then the Prince to be proceeded against or " remited, as he shall give satisfaction, and the " duke the like; and that the revenue of the " crown be sequestered: also the ten thousand " pounds to be added, be disposed of to public use.

" 3. That public justice may be done upon " some capital causers, or actors in the war.

" 4. That the rest, upon submission, may have " mercy for their lives.

" 5. That the soldiers have their arrears.

" 6. That public debts be paid chiefly to those " who voluntarily laid out their estates, and ven- " tured their lives; and this to be done by fines of " delinquents, and the estates of those excluded " from pardon.

" 7. After public justice thus done, then that a " reasonable certain period be put to this parlia- " ment.

" 8. That there be a certain succession of future " parliaments, annual or biennial, with secure " provision; 1. For the certainty of meeting. " 2. For equal distribution of elections, to render " the commons house an equal representative. " 3. For certainty of the peoples meeting, and that " none who have ingaged in the late war, or shall " ingage against the right of parliament and king- " dom, or adhere to the enemies thereof, be ca- " pable of electing, or being elected, during some " years; nor those who shall not join with them, " but oppose this setlement. 4. For clearing the " power of this representative, it be declared to " have the supreme power; as to the governing " and preservation of the whole; as to the people " of England, and to altering, repealing, or abo- " lishing laws; the making war or peace; the " highest or final judgment in all civil things; and " all ministers or officers of state shall be accountable " to them, bound and concluded thereby; pro- " vided, First: They may not censure, or ques- " tion any man after the end of this parliament, " for any thing said, or done, in reference to the " late war. Secondly: They may not render up, " give or take away any right, liberty, or safety, " contained in this setlement or agreement: that " there be a liberty of entering dissents in the said " representative; in case of corruption in these " highest trusts, the people may know who are " free, and who guilty, that so they may not trust " such for the future; but with farther penalty to " any for their future judgment there.

" 9. That no King be hereafter admited, but " upon election of, and as upon trust from the peo- " ple, by such their representative, not without first " disclaiming and disavowing all pretense to a ne- " gative voice against the determination of the said " representative, or commons in parliament, and " that to be done in such form more clear than " heretofore in the coronation-oath.

" These matters of a general setlement are pro- " pounded to be done by this parliament, and to " be farther established by a general contract or " agreement of the people, with subscriptions " thereunto; also, that it be provided, that none " be capable of benefit, by this agreement, who " shall not consent and subscribe thereunto, nor " any King be admited to the crown, or other " person to any other office or place of public " trust, without expres accord and subscription to " the same."

The parliament returns no answer.

The parliament returned not any answer to this remonstrance, nor to some others of a like nature, presented them during the treaty. I have already mentioned that of the eleventh of September, from thousands of the inhabitants in and about London, and that of the masters and commanders of ships. The thirtieth ditto, they received another, in the name of many thousands of the county of Oxon. The tenth of October, a petition was presented to the commons, signed by those of Newcastle, desiring that speedy justice might be executed upon the greatest delinquents. That same day, those of Yorkshire sent in a like petition, saying, " his " Majesty had confessed himself, and his party, to " be guilty of the blood which had been shed." The thirtieth ditto, the officers of Ingoldsby's regiment, garisoned at Oxford, presented a petition to the general, desiring, " immediate care be taken, " that justice be done upon the principal invaders " of their liberties, namely, the King and his " party, and sufficient caution given to future " Kings for preventing their inslaving the people " hereafter." Adding, " That, being apprehen- " sive the issue of the treaty now in hand could " neither be just nor safe, they prayed his excel- " lency to re-establish a general council of the " army, to consider of some effectual remedies to " this evil, either by representing the same to the " house of commons, as the petitioners of London, " or by some other way." On the other hand, while Cromwell was at Pontefract, every regiment of his army presented petitions to him, demanding justice upon the King; which were all sent to the general (2). Hence it appears, that the army's remonstrance was purely the effect of such plots as had been laid by the Independents, who, in diverse parts of England, infused these violent resolutions into the officers and people, to hinder the conclusion of a treaty which could not but ruin their party. There is great likelihood the Preſbyterians fully penetrated the Independents deſigns; and indeed theſe petitions were but too convincing evidences: but they hoped to amuſe them 'till the treaty was ended; not doubting but that at length King Charles would conſent to the abolition of Epiſcopacy. As for the other articles, which were not yet adjuſted, they would probably have rather choſen to yield them to the King, than retard the treaty's concluſion, which was to them ſo neceſſary. Affairs being in this ſituation, it was not proper ſtill farther to exaſperate the Independents by diſagreeable anſwers. On the other ſide, they could not bear the thoughts of agreeing with his Majeſty, without obtaining the abolition of Epiſcopacy, not believing themſelves in any ſafety while even the name of biſhop was ſubſiſting. In a word, it was not proper to attempt reſiſting the army by force; ſince, to all appearance, their preparations would but have haſtened the execution of the army's reſolutions, whereas it was their intereſt to amuſe them, were it only for a few days. Their ſole hope was therefore grounded on the King's compliance, which they ſcarcely queſtioned, conſidering the manifeſt danger to which his obſtinacy would expoſe him: for it is not likely that he was ignorant of the petitions brought in againſt him, or was not ſoon informed of the army's remonſtrance, ſince all comers had free acceſs to his perſon.

Both houſes indeavor to amuſe the army.

Three days after the parliament had received the remonſtrance, letters came from the commiſſioners at Newport, with his Majeſty's anſwer concerning the marquis of Ormond, and biſhops lands, viz. that he could not give Ormond any orders before the treaty was ſigned, but then would do as both houſes deſired; and, if the marquis refuſed to obey, would take ſuch meaſures againſt him as ſhould be ſatisfactory to the two houſes: that, as to the biſhops lands, he perſiſted in his former offers. This anſwer afforded no great proſpect of a ſpeedy accommodation. However, as it was delivered on the ſixteenth, two days before the army's remonſtrance was preſented, it was hoped, the next news from Newport would be more ſatisfactory. But, on the twenty-fifth, both houſes were informed, by letters from the commiſſioners, that his Majeſty had poſitively refuſed making any addition to his former anſwers (1).

p. 1338.

This was not all. They were alſo then acquainted, that the general had required colonel Hammond to attend him at the head-quarters, and ſent colonel Ewers to take care of his Majeſty, in the iſle of Wight, who kept the King very ſtrictly guarded. Thus the precautions taken by the parliament, to prevent King Charles's coming to treat perſonally at London, for fear he ſhould meet with too many friends, were the cauſe they could not be maſter of his perſon, when it would have been neceſſary. Two days after, the commons received a letter from colonel Hammond, with general Fairfax's order for his repairing to the army, and reſigning his command to colonel Ewers; whereupon the commons voted, that colonel Hammond ſhould be required to ſtay in the iſle of Wight, and the general be acquainted with this vote: but Hammond was already gone to the army, and had reſigned the cuſtody of his Majeſty to Ewers. Notwithſtanding all this, the parliament ſeems not to have deſpaired of agreeing with Charles, ſince the commons defered taking into conſideration the army's remonſtrance 'till the firſt of December, in order to be better able to anſwer it when they ſhould know the King's ultimate determination. That ſame day, general Fairfax received from thoſe troops which were in the North, and in Wales, petitions wholly agreeable to the army's remonſtrance.

Petitions to the general.

After this general had thus made himſelf maſter of the King's perſon, without the two houſes privity, there was no great likelihood, he ſhould be diſpoſed to receive their injunctions. However, the commons gave him to underſtand, that his orders to Ewers were contrary both to their reſolves, and colonel Hammond's inſtructions, and that it was the houſes pleaſure, he ſhould recall his orders, and re-admit Hammond to attend his charge in the iſle of Wight. But the general and council of war had no manner of regard to this order.

of no effect.

Next day, his Majeſty was, by Fairfax's command, removed to Hurſt-caſtle, in Hampſhire, ſituated on a narrow ſlip of land, advancing into the ſea, oppoſite to the iſle of Wight; nor had the two houſes notice thereof 'till three days after (2).

Mean while the army was not idle; being reſolved to run all hazards to prevent the treaty's being concluded. The ſame day, November the thirtieth, they publiſhed a declaration, or manifeſto, wherein they plainly diſcovered their deſigns. It ran thus: viz.

The army's declaration. Nov. 30. Whitelock. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1341.

" That the army, being full of ſad apprehenſions " concerning the danger and evil of the treaty " with the King, and of any accommodation with " him, or reſtitution of him thereupon, they did, " by a remonſtrance, make their application to the " houſe of commons. That they took this courſe " thro' their earneſt deſire, that thoſe matters, of " higheſt concernment to the public intereſt of the " nation, might be purſued and provided for, if poſ- " ſible by thoſe whoſe proper work and truſt it was: " but, to their grief, they found that, inſtead of any " ſatisfaction, or reaſonable anſwer thereunto, they " were wholly rejected, without any conſideration " of them. For they were laid aſide 'till the " Monday following, by which time the treaty, " as then ſuppoſed, would have been concluded: " but that failing, and two days more being added " to the treaty, the conſideration of their remon- " ſtrance in the day appointed was waved and laid " aſide; the treaty mean while going on in the " former way and terms, and like to be concluded " the very next day. The army therefore, not " having received any anſwer to their former pro- " poſals, could not but remain confident, that the " prevailing part of thoſe to whom they did apply " had, as it were, their eyes wilfully ſhut, and ears " ſtoped againſt any thing of light or reaſon offered " them, ſo as not to diſcern the dangers where- " with the kingdom was threatened.

" The army then ſeeing nothing left, to which " the parliament's ingaging and perſiſting in ſuch " ways could rationally be attributed, leſs than a " treacherous or corrupt neglect of, and apoſtaſy " from the public truſt repoſed in them, they " thought fit to appeal to the common judgments " of indifferent and uncorrupted men, and to the " more righteous judgment of God above all."

After juſtifying this extraordinary appeal in the beſt manner they could, they " admoniſhed ſuch " members as were upright, and had a juſt ſenſe " of thoſe things, to proteſt againſt the houſe's con- " duct and reſolves, and withdraw," promiſing,

" to look upon them as perſons who had the chief " truſt of the kingdom remaining in them, and " to adhere to them, and be guided by them, " 'till the introducing of a more formal power, in " a juſt repreſentative, was ſpeedily indeavored." Then they declared, " That they were ready to lay " down their arms, if their remonſtrance was an- " ſwered; but that the little notice taken of their " propoſitions made them ſenſible, there was no- " thing to be hoped: and therefore, the caſe " being ſo extraordinary, and the danger ſo preſ- " ſing, they were drawing up with their army to " London, there to follow Providence, as God " ſhould clear their way."

General Fairfax writes to London. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1349,1350.

The firſt of December, Fairfax wrote to the city, informing them of the army's advance towards London, on account of the parliament's contempt of their remonſtrance: that they had no thought of plunder or other wrong to the city, or ſo much as troubling the inhabitants with quartering any ſoldiers; but that, for prevention of all violence, he deſired forty thouſand pounds might be provided by next day (1). The houſe of commons agreed, that the city ſhould ſend the army this ſum, and acquainted that general, it was the houſe's pleaſure, he ſhould not remove nearer London.

He comes to London. Ibid. Whitelock.

The ſecond ditto, the houſe took into conſideration his Majeſty's offers; but without coming to any concluſion. While they were debating, Fairfax arrived, with ſeveral regiments, and took up their quarters in Whitehall, St. James's, the Meuſe, and ſuch other places in the city-ſkirts as he judged moſt convenient for his purpoſes.

Votes upon his Majeſty's removal to Hurſt-caſtle. Idem. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 183. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1351, 1352.

The third, being Sunday, the parliament did not ſit: but on the fourth, the commons reſumed the debate of Charles's conceſſions, which was interrupted by the news of that Prince's removal to Hurſt-caſtle. Immediately hereupon they voted, That the carrying his Majeſty priſoner to Hurſt-caſtle, was without the houſe's advice and conſent. After that, they re-debated the King's offers, and ſat the whole day and night, 'till five in the morning. At length, it was propoſed, whether the queſtion ſhould be put; and was carried by a hundred and forty againſt a hundred and four. Then the main queſtion being put, it was voted, "That his Majeſty's conceſſions to the pro- " poſitions of parliament upon the treaty, were ſuf- " ficient grounds for ſetling the peace of the king- " dom." Yet I cannot think this vote was unanimous, as lord Clarendon affirms (2): what has been juſt ſeen ſeeming rather to ſhew, that a good number of members were diſſatisfied with this reſolution.

Commitee to confer with the general. p. 1352.

Immediately after, the houſe appointed a commitee to confer with general Fairfax, for the better procuring a good correſpondence between the parliament and army; and then adjourned to Wedneſday.

More regiments brought to London.

That ſame day, diverſe other regiments came and quartered in the ſuburbs of London, and Fairfax required, by a proclamation he got iſſued, that all delinquents, who had not perfected their compoſitions, ſhould depart ten miles from London *, on pain of being proceeded againſt as priſoners of war.

Wedneſday, the ſixth of December, his ſaid excellency ſent two regiments to Weſtminſter, and the city trained-bands, who had been ſet there, ſome months ſince, for guards to the parliament, were diſcharged. After the ſoldiers were drawn up in the court of Requeſts, on the ſtairs, and in the Lobby, when the members offered to go in, colonel Pride, having in his hand a liſt of names, ſeized forty-one, and ſent them into the court of Wards, where they were kept under guard (3). The houſe having notice thereof ſent their ſerjeant at arms to acquaint theſe members, that they ſhould forthwith attend the ſervice of the houſe. But the officer of the guard anſwered, he had order to ſecure them, which order he was to obey before any other command (4).

Not long after, colonel Whaley, with other officers, preſented to the houſe a paper intitled, " Propoſals and Deſires of the Army, in Vindica- " tion of their Conduct;" whereof here follows the ſubſtance: viz.

The army's propoſals preſented to the houſe of commons. Idem. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1354.

" 1. Whereas ſeveral members of your houſe (5), " were, in the year 1647, impeached by yourſelves " for treaſon, or for high crimes and miſdemeanors, " in relation to the treaſonable ingagement in the " city of London, the violence then done upon the " parliament, the levying of a new war, and other " evils, in maintenance and proſecution thereof; " and, upon clear proofs againſt them, were by " your cenſure expelled the houſe, and diſabled " from farther truſt therein, and upon new writs " iſſued out, new members were choſen and re- " turned in ſome of their rooms; and yet by the " prevalence of their faction, when, in the laſt " ſummer's wars, diverſe faithful members were " ingaged abroad upon neceſſary public ſervice, " and others, thro' malignant tumults and diſturb- " ances, could not ſafely attend the houſe, the " ſame perſons were afterwards re-admited to ſit " in the houſe, and vote as formerly, without any " trial, or ſatisfaction in the things whereof they " were accuſed.

" 2. Whereas, by the confederacy of major-gene- " ral Brown (now ſherif of London) with the ſaid " impeached members and others, the Scots were " invited and drawn in to invade this kingdom, " laſt ſummer, inſomuch as when, upon their actual " invaſion, the houſe proceeded to declare them " enemies, and thoſe who adhered to them traitors; " yet the ſaid confederators, and other treacherous " members, to the number of ninety and odd, as " upon the diviſion of the houſe appeared, did, by " their counſels and votes, indeavor to hinder the " houſe from declaring againſt their confederate in- " vaders: We deſire, that the ſaid major-general " Brown may be alſo ſecured and brought to judg- " ment, and that the reſt of the ninety and odd " perſons diſſenting againſt the ſaid vote, may be " excluded the houſe.

CHARLES I AN' 1648.

" neceſſity whereof you had once ſo cleared to the " world; alſo in the votes for entertaining or ſeek- " ing, after all, that perſonal treaty: and laſtly, " in the votes declaring the King's paſſed conceſ- " ſions to be a ground for the houſe to proceed " upon, for ſetling the peace of the kingdom, not- " withſtanding the viſible inſufficiency and defects " of them in things eſſentially concerning the pub- " lic intereſt and liberties of the kingdom, as thoſe " propounded in our late remonſtrance are, and in " other matters both religious and civil. We there- " fore moſt earneſtly deſire, that all ſuch faithful " members who are innocent in theſe things, would " immediately, by proteſtation and public declara- " tion, acquit themſelves from any guilt of, or " concurrence in the ſeveral votes or counſels here " before particularly mentioned as corrupt or de- " ſtructive, that the kingdom may know thoſe who " have kept their truſt, and diſtinguiſh themſelves " from the reſt who have thus falſified the ſame; " and that all ſuch as cannot, or ſhall not ſo acquit " themſelves particularly, may be immediately ex- " cluded or ſuſpended the houſe, and not re-admited " until they have given clear ſatisfaction therein, " to the judgment of thoſe who now ſo acquit them- " ſelves, and the grounds of ſuch ſatisfaction be " publiſhed to the kingdom.

" 4. Thus, ſuch as, by faithfulneſs, have re- " tained their truſt, being ſet in a condition to " purſue and perform the ſame, without ſuch inter- " ruptions, diverſions and depravations of counſels " as formerly; we ſhall deſire, and hope you will " ſpeedily and vigorouſly proceed to take order " for the execution of juſtice; to ſet a ſhort period " to your own power; to provide for a ſpeedy " ſucceſſion of equal repreſentatives, according to " our late remonſtrance, wherein differences in the " kingdom may be ended, and we and others may " comfortably acquieſce; as, for our parts, we " hereby ingage and aſſure you we ſhall."

It would be needleſs to make any remark and obſervations upon this paper, the injuſtice and violence whereof are ſo very obvious. But it was neceſſary to acquaint our readers with its contents, for the following reaſon. There are hiſtorians whoſe partiality has induced them either to omit, or but juſt mention it, without relating the ſubſtance, for fear of convincing their readers, that the Preſbyterians were not concerned in what was afterwards tranſacted, and that the Independents were the true and ſole authors thereof.

A hundred members excluded the houſe by the ſoldiers. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1355. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 183. The houſe wholly conſiſts of Independents.

December the ſeventh, the commons, as they were repairing to their houſe, found the door within and without guarded by ſoldiers, who hindered many from going in (1). Lord Clarendon ſays, near one hundred were denied entrance. This makes me preſume thoſe ninety and odd, mentioned in the remonſtrance, to have been of this number. So, from this day, the houſe of commons is to be conſidered as conſiſting abſolutely of Independents: very ſeemingly, from that day, ſcarce any Preſbyterian members were admited. Howſoever this be, the face of that houſe was once more changed by this new revolution. The Preſbyterians had been ſuperior, from the begining of hoſtilities, to the ſixth of Auguſt, 1647. The Independents had prevailed from that day, 'till near the cloſe of 1648, when the army was forced to remove from London; after which the Preſbyterians were again maſters. Finally, on the ſixth and ſeventh of December, this ſame year, the Independents utterly expelled the Preſbyterians, or at leaſt diſabled them from ſupporting their party. This muſt be carefully remembered by thoſe who deſire to have a clear idea of our preſent hiſtory.

CHARLES I AN' 1648.

This ſame day, December the ſeventh, Cromwell, who arrived at London the preceding night (2), ſat in the houſe, and received thanks for his ſignal ſervices.

Cromwell arrives at London. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1355.

Notwithſtanding general Fairfax had promiſed the Londoners not to quarter his ſoldiers upon them, as this promiſe was only conditionally that the ſum demanded was diſburſed, and that city had not furniſhed the required monies, he ordered two regiments into the city, and next day a third; after which he took away twenty thouſand pounds from Weavers-hall, aſſuring the treaſurer he ſhould be reimburſed out of thoſe aſſeſſments which their citizens owed the army.

Fairfax ſeizes the money in Weavers-hall. p. 1356, 1358.

About this ſame time was preſented to general Fairfax a plan, intitled, "A new Repreſentative, " or, an Agreement of the People," for ſetling the government (3). This plan was wholly founded upon Independent principles, and agreeable to the army's remonſtrance, except that it was more extenſive on the reſpective articles. This agreement was propounded as a rule for future government, and to be ſubſcribed throughout the kingdom: but as this plan was not executed, tho' it was drawn with great pains by the council of war, and even ſeemed to be approved by the parliament, I do not think inſerting it here any way neceſſary (4).

Plan for ſetling the government. Dec. 11. p. 1358. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 185.

The ſecluded members having publiſhed a proteſtation againſt the violence done them, both houſes declared the proteſtation to be falſe, ſcandalous and ſeditious, tending to deſtroy the fundamental government of the kingdom; and ordered, that all perſons, who had any hand in framing or publiſhing it, ſhould be incapable to bear any office, or to ſit as members of either houſe. They farther ordained, that all abſent members, upon their coming to the houſe, ſhould diſclaim their being concerned in, or giving conſent to the contriving or publiſhing this proteſtation.

The ſecluded members proteſtation, voted ſcandalous. Ibid. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1363.

After that, both houſes paſſed an ordinance, that no perſons who had been delinquents, or aſſiſted the King againſt the parliament in the firſt or ſecond wars (5), or abeted the late tumults within the cities of London and Weſtminſter, or the counties of Eſſex, Kent, Middleſex, or Surrey, ſhould be elected, or give their voice for electing, the lord-mayor, aldermen, common-council-men, or any other officers. Some of the arreſted members releaſed. Ruſhworth. Vol. VII. p. 1369. Whitelock.

The twentieth of December, general Fairfax ordered fifteen or ſixteen of thoſe members whom the army had ſecured, to be releaſed, with liberty to reſume their places in the houſe, if they pleaſed.

Obſervation on the houſe of lords.

We have juſt ſeen how greatly the countenance of affairs was changed, thro' the notable turn they took on the ſixth and ſeventh of December. The commons were now all Independents, openly ſupported by the army, and their deſign was equally to deſtroy King, Monarchy, Epiſcopacy and Preſbytery. As for the houſe of lords, who had uſed their indeavor, tho' in vain, to haſten the accommodation, they ſaw themſelves, ſince this revolution, obliged to follow the ſtream, which was too rapid to be oppoſed. There were in the houſe but few peers, moſt of them indeed Preſbyterians, but too weak, in their preſent ſituation, to aſſert their negative voice, and their other privileges. While the King was able to protect ſuch as applied to him, their lordſhips retained ſome authority, becauſe they were not without a reſourſe, if ſlighted by the commons: but, after Naſeby-fight, the caſe was altered. The commons aſſumed ſuch a ſuperiority, that the peers had no other way to ſupport themſelves, but by approving, or feigning to approve whatever was done by the lower-houſe, for fear of creating a rupture which muſt have been fatal to them, ſince they would have been utterly at a loſs how to proceed. If they were obliged to behave in this manner while their own party prevailed in that houſe, it is no wonder they did not dare to deviate from this politic procedure when the Independents had gained the aſcendant. To what purpoſe would it have been to reſiſt the torrent? We ſhall preſently ſee their firſt oppoſition to a material point irrecoverably ruined them. They therefore who cenſure them for too much compliance with the tranſactions ſince the ſixth of December, 1648, ought to remember, that this is not a matter wherein we are to reaſon upon the general ideas of the Engliſh parliament's conſtitution, but rather upon the particular idea of the ſituation this parliament was in at that juncture.

Sundry petitions for juſtice upon the King. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1367, 1373, 1374.

Since the Independents were maſters in parliament, petitions againſt King Charles came in ſo faſt, that ſcarce a day paſſed without ſome one being preſented to the commons, particularly from the gariſons, which were part of the army. Lambert being returned from Scotland, the regiments under his command failed not preſenting a petition agreeable to the army's remonſtrance. Somerſetſhire, where the King had formerly many adherents, diſtinguiſhed itſelf, on this occaſion, above all the reſt, by preſenting a petition, deſiring that ſpeedy and effectual juſtice might be executed upon the chief delinquent, i. e. the King. The commons were ſo pleaſed with ſuch a petition from a whole county that, to incourage others to follow this example, the petitioners were called in and received the houſe's thankful acknowledgment; and the petition with the order of thanks were forthwith printed and publiſhed. It does not however appear that other counties did the like: only Norfolk, ſome few days after, deſired by a petition, that the King himſelf might be brought to impartial juſtice.

Commitee appointed to draw up a charge againſt him.

Finally, on the twenty-third of December, the houſe of commons having, purſuant to the army's deſires, determined on bringing to a trial the chief delinquents, and intending to begin with the King, appointed a commitee of thirty-eight to draw up a charge, and for that purpoſe to receive all informations and examinations of witneſſes for the matters of fact againſt him.

This ſame day, the fleet under the earl of Warwick's command, ſent general Fairfax a declaration, that they concurred with the army in their remonſtrance. This redounded not much to the honor of that noble admiral, who having been one of the Preſbyterians chief leaders, was the very firſt who quited his party to join with the Independents.

His Majeſty's trial being thus reſolved (a reſolution projected by ſeveral officers of the army, when he firſt retired to the iſle of Wight) colonel Harriſon was ordered to remove him from Hurſt-caſtle to Windſor. The whole time this Prince was in the iſle of Wight, he held a private correſpondence with lord Newburgh. Since his being at Hurſt, that nobleman had found means to acquaint him, he was to be removed to Windſor; and, as his houſe was in the road (1), counſelled him to indeavor dining there, and to complain of his horſe's pace; promiſing to ſupply him with one of the ſwifteſt in all England, by means whereof he might attempt his eſcape. Accordingly, all the morning Charles complained, that his horſe went very uneaſy, and managed ſo artfully, that he was conducted to dine with lord Newburgh: but when his Majeſty came there, he was preſently told, that the horſe ſo much depended on was, the day before, lamed with a kick. This ſtratagem failing, King Charles was conveyed to Windſor, where he was kept 'till the nineteenth of January, 1648-9, when he was removed to St. James's.

Notice has been already taken of the common-council of London's repreſentation concerning the election of a lord-mayor, and other city-officers. The houſe of commons, having heard the report of their commitee appointed for that purpoſe, ordered, that their former ordinance ſhould be punctually executed; not regarding that the magiſtrates of London ſhould be choſen out of the ableſt and moſt ſubſtantial citizens, provided they were of the reigning party. They farther ordered, that thenceforwards freemen ſhould not be obliged to take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy.

That ſame day, being the twenty-eighth of December, the commitee appointed to conſider of drawing up a charge againſt King Charles, reported an ordinance for attainting him of high-treaſon, and for trying him by ſuch commiſſioners as ſhould be named in the ordinance, which, being read the firſt time, was ordered to be read again next morning. But, as the houſe knew their ordinance would be approved at the third reading, they paſſed an act for erecting a High Court of Juſtice, with power to try the King. The preface to this extraordinary act was as follows: viz.

The lords reject it. Jan. 3. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 187. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1382.

This ordinance for trying his Majeſty paſſed in the houſe of commons, the ſecond of January, and was ſent up the ſame day to the lords for their concurrence. Since the ſixth of December, the upper-houſe had conſiſted only of nine peers, the reſt having abſented themſelves, that they might not be obliged to countenance the commons outragious proceedings: but on notice, that the ordinance would that day be ſent up to the lords, there came more peers than uſual, as the earls of Northumberland, Mancheſter, Rutland, lords North, Rochford, Maynard, Dacres, in all ſixteen. * The ordinance being read, was unanimouſly rejected. However to gain time, if poſſible, their lordſhips agreed to acquaint the commons, that they would ſend anſwer by meſſengers of their own; and at the ſame time adjourned for ten days. This artifice was fruitleſs. The commons, having ordered the upper-houſe's journal to be examined, and finding the ordinance was rejected, voted. " That all mem- " bers of the houſe of commons, and others, ap- " pointed to act in any ordinance wherein the " lords were joined, ſhall be impowered to ſit, " act and execute, in the ſaid ſeveral commitees " of themſelves, notwithſtanding the houſe of peers " join not with them." And therefore they ordered the names of ſix lords, who had been appointed for judges, to be left out of the commiſſion, and others to be nominated in their ſtead. Among theſe latter was ſerjeant Bradſhaw, who was afterwards choſen preſident of the high court of juſtice. Then, the houſe voted Theſe principles, tho' directly contrary to the true conſtitution of the Engliſh government, were however very agreeable to thoſe of the Independents, whoſe intention was to convert the Monarchy into a Republic.

The ordinance for trying his Majeſty, with the amendments requiſite to be made, for want of the lords concurrence, paſſed the houſe of commons, the ſixth of January.

The following days, to the twentieth, were imployed in preparation for the trial; the like whereof had never yet been ſeen in the univerſe. I intend not to ſwell this hiſtory with the circumſtances of this moſt memorable trial. They are to be found in a little book, intitled, " A True Ac- " count of the Trial of Charles Stuart, &c." publiſhed at London in 1650, and tranſlated into French, wherein nothing is omited. I imagine I ſhall do the reader no injury, to refer him to this little book, which is not ſcarce, and which will inform him of all particulars (3). I ſhall content myſelf therefore with briefly obſerving what to me ſeems moſt material in this affair.

Moſt material points in King Charles's trial

I. The high court of juſtice obſerved the ſame rules in trying the King, as in judging a common malefactor, there being no precedent of ſuch a trial.

II. The principal article of the accuſation was, that the King had levied war againſt the parliament, which was undeniable: the ſeveral ſieges and battles were evident proofs of it. But this ought not to have been the principal point: it ſhould have been proved, that he was the aggreſſor and real author of this war; for it is manifeſt that, had this war been only defenſive on his part, he was not to be blamed. And yet, in the charge, he was ſuppoſed to have put the parliament under a neceſſity of defending themſelves, and this point, which was the chief, not only was not proved, but even unattempted to be ſo. The witneſſes depoſitions tended not to ſhew, that this Prince had forced the parliament to take arms, but only that he had been ſeen ſword in hand againſt the parliament, and giving orders to levy war. The queſtion, which of the two commenced war (King or parliament) ought to have been fully

(2) Theſe votes, ſays Ruſhworth (p. 1383, of the ſame volume) being reported to the houſe, they put them one after another to the queſtion, and there was not one negative voice to any one of them. ——— At this time Mr. Elſynge deſired to be diſmiſſed from being clerk of the parliament, becauſe (ſays Whitelock, Mem. p. 364) of his own knowledge, he would have no hand in the buſineſs of the King. He was a juſt and honeſt man, and a moſt excellent clerk. ——— Jan. 6. cleared, cleared. But tho' it had been ſo, to the King's diſadvantage, who knows not, that he who actually begins a war is not always the aggreſſor? This was a point of great diſcuſſion, and which unbiaſſed judges would have found difficult to decide: for, on recollection of what has been advanced in the hiſtory of this reign, it will be obſerved that, tho' it is evident King Charles governed arbitrarily for ſome years, the ground of the war he undertook was not in maintenance of this arbitrary power. He had fully conſented to the annulling his uſurpations: but the war's ground, on his part, was the defenſe of that power which appertains to the Engliſh Kings by the laws of England. On the parliament's ſide, the war's ground was, That, in a ſuppoſition, King Charles could not any more be truſted, they would have diveſted him of the power his legal prerogatives afforded him to return to his priſtine courſes, govern futurely as he had done formerly. His Majeſty was unwilling to be curbed, and the parliament would ſet bounds to his power. This was the true ground of their quarrel, and the ſubſequent wars. It was not therefore eaſy to determine who was the firſt author thereof. The King refuſed to give other ſecurity for his future conduct than his word; and the parliament pretended to have ſtrong reaſons to ſuſpect the word of a Prince who had ſo often broke it. To determine on which ſide juſtice and reaſon lay, King Charles's heart muſt have been inſpected, to know whether he was ſincere, or intended to deceive his parliament. On the other hand, it was neceſſary to know, whether the parliament's directors had not ſome other end than public benefit, and whether private intereſts were not concealed under that pretext. But all this could be known only to the Omniſcient Creator. And yet, the parliament, being judge and party, ſuppoſed, without alleging any proof, that King Charles was the aggreſſor and ſole author of the war.

Of the parliament's making themſelves his Majeſty's judges.

III. There are, in hiſtory, frequent inſtances of Kings aſſaſſinated by their ſubjects, in conſequence either of public hatred, or of private revenge, or of the intereſt of ſome faction. The Engliſh hiſtory furniſhes, even ſince the Conqueſt, examples of two Kings ſolemnly depoſed and impriſoned: but, 'till Charles I, it no where appears, that any King was ever tried for his life, before his own ſubjects, as judges. I ſhall ſay nothing here of other Sovereigns, who are poſſeſſed of a greater authority over their vaſſals than are the Kings of England; for there may be a wide difference between Sovereigns in that reſpect. But confining myſelf wholly to the kingdom of England, and ſuppoſing the conſtitution of the government ſuch as it was from the Conqueſt to Charles I, I ſhall briefly ſet forth what has been ſaid, for and againſt ſo extraordinary a trial. Firſt, it is demanded, On what law, natural or poſitive, was founded the right aſſumed by the parliament of England to try their King? The moſt plauſible anſwer, in vindication of the parliament's proceedings, is as follows.

Reaſons for the parliament.

According to the conſtitution of the Engliſh government, the King is no leſs bound than the ſubject, to obſerve the laws to which himſelf, or predeceſſors aſſented, which is the principal clauſe of the coronation-oath. If this obligation be equal on both ſides, there muſt be therefore equally means to procure its being diſcharged, in caſe of neglect. As for the ſubject, there is no manner of difficulty: the penalties againſt offenders are univerſally known, and the courts of juſtice are appointed to inflict the ſame. It is true, the laws have ordained no penalty on ſuch Kings as diſcharge not their duty, as well thro' reſpect to the regal dignity, as becauſe it cannot be ſuppoſed that the King, to whom the execution of the laws is commited, ſhould be the firſt to break them, and betray the truſt lodged in him by his people: he is nevertheleſs bound to obſerve them himſelf, and cauſe them to be obſerved by the ſubject; this is a principle generally acknowledged. But what is this obligation, if the obſervance of the laws depends ſolely on his will, and there be no juſt means to compel him to obſerve them, or puniſh him when he breaks them? Will it not be a mere empty ſound, without any meaning? And will not the Engliſh government be as arbitrary as that of any other region throughout the globe? Since therefore the laws have not decreed any penalty againſt a King who ſhould neglect his duty, or the manner to conſtrain him to diſcharge it; and as, nevertheleſs, he is bound by the ſame laws to procure the obſervance thereof, and to obſerve them himſelf, the nation's repreſentative in parliament is, of courſe, to call him to account, ſince no other means can poſſibly be deviſed. Suppoſing the King has violated the nation's moſt fundamental laws, ſhall foreigners be applied to, in order to bring him to juſtice? Can a King of England, contrary to experience, be ſuppoſed under any impoſſibility of breaking a nation's fundamental laws, of indeavoring to ſubvert them, and of eſtabliſhing deſpotiſm? Will it be maintained, that he may do it with impunity? But if he is aſſured of impunity, what difference is there between the Engliſh, and the moſt deſpotic governments, ſince its preſervation will ſolely depend on the King's probity and will? If he runs no hazard in attempting to alter the conſtitution, after ten attempts, he will try again, even 'till he ſucceeds. As to the objection, That leſs violent means than war may be uſed to oblige Kings to the obſervance of the laws, and leſs unjuſt and extraordinary, than taking away their lives, to puniſh them for ſuch violation: it is anſwered, This is true, and the parliament had accordingly tried to ſecure the government by other methods, as by demanding of his Majeſty, that all power of the militia might be lodged in both houſes; had his Majeſty agreed to it, the realm would have been in peace, and the peoples jealouſies have ceaſed: but he had taken arms to prevent the parliament's uſing theſe means; a clear evidence that his deſign was to maintain himſelf in a condition to alter the government when he ſhould have opportunity. This unjuſt war had been the occaſion of infinite miſchiefs; had deſtroyed many thouſands of his ſubjects, and ruined all the reſt; and if he was brought to a trial, it was not ſo much to puniſh him for violating the laws, as for prefering the unjuſt and violent way of arms, before the expedients offered him to prevent his breaking them in after times.

Charles I An' 1648.

Reaſons againſt the parliament.

King Charles's advocates ſay, 1. Tho' the Kings of England have not ſo much authority in their realm as ſome other Potentates, it follows not that they may be put upon a level with the ſubjects, and made equally accountable for their actions.

2. The principle laid down for baſis, that there is equal obligation on both King and ſubject to obſerve the law, is falſe, and conſequently the whole reaſoning founded thereon of no force or validity. For, as private perſons are intruſted only with their own conduct, nothing can exempt them from due obſervance of the laws. But Kings being intruſted with the government of the ſtate, and execution of the laws, they have conſequently power to qualify them on certain occaſions; otherwiſe this truſt would be to no purpoſe. The laws could not foreſee every thing, and there are occaſions where it is abſolutely neceſſary for the public good, to act contrary to them, or at leaſt, to ſuſpend the obſervance of them; and therefore, the obligation of King and ſubject is not equal.

3. Admiting that his Majeſty had violated ſome

of the realm's fundamental laws, and levied war againſt his parliament after the moſt unjuſt manner, it did not follow that he might be puniſhed with death, by reaſon he has neither ſuperior nor equal in the kingdom, and he could have none but ſubjects for his judges. Beſide, he was the fountain of juſtice; and it was abſurd to make liable to juſtice him from whom juſtice flows and derives its whole authority.

4. According to this ſuppoſition, the chance of war having put him in the power of his enemies, he might have been detained in priſon, and prevented from doing miſchief, 'till he was prevailed with to grant all the ſecurities required: but there was a wide difference between impriſonment and death; as the firſt could be conſidered as a reaſonable and neceſſary precaution, and the other as a puniſhment ſubjects were not impowered to inflict on their Sovereign, as indeed the like had never been heard of.

5. But the ſuppoſition, that King Charles had violated the laws, and levied unjuſt war againſt his parliament, was very far from being well-grounded. Firſt, as to the laws, if that Prince, miſ-led by evil counſels, had on ſome occaſions carried his power too far, when the parliament made him ſenſible of the ill conſequences of this conduct, he had chearfully and willingly renounced the exorbitant power to which he before believed himſelf to be juſtly intitled. He had, without delay, conſented to all the acts tendered him on that ſubject, and agreed, that his moſt intimate counſellors ſhould be brought to juſtice. The parliament had accepted this reparation, without expreſſing the leaſt deſire of making him ſuffer for his paſſed faults: after that, it was abſurd to allege theſe ſame faults, ſo amply repaired, as a motive of the juſtice pretended to be executed upon him.

6. As for the war he had levied againſt his parliament, it was wrongfully aſſerted, and without the leaſt proof, that his Majeſty had raiſed and begun it purpoſely to avoid giving his people ſecurity: and, under color of deſiring ſecurity for the future, a deſire wholly founded upon mere ſuſpicions and bare poſſibilities, that the King might abuſe his power, it was pretended to ſtrip him of all his prerogatives, in a word, of the regal authority, and leave him only a ſhadow of royalty. Thus, ſuppoſing it true, that his Majeſty did actually begin the war, which was not any how proved, it would alſo be true, that the parliament had excited it, by attempting, under a vain pretenſe of peace and concord, to reduce his Majeſty to the abjecteſt and moſt melancholy ſtate a Sovereign can poſſibly be in.

7. The juſtice, pretended to be executed upon this Monarch, was founded intirely on two ſuppoſitions, not ſupported by any proof. The firſt, that his Majeſty had undertaken the war, only to free himſelf from giving ſecurity. The ſecond, that there was reaſon to fear he would imploy what power ſhould be left him in ſubverting the conſtitution. All reaſonable perſons were therefore left to judge, whether there was juſtice in trampling upon all laws, divine and human, and inflicting upon their Sovereign a capital puniſhment on two ſuch raſh ſuppoſitions.

8. With regard to what rapines, deſolations, bloodſhed, or other calamitous miſchiefs, were occaſioned by the wars, before they could be charged to his Majeſty's account, it ought at leaſt to have been well proved that he was really author of the war: but if this point was fully ſcrutiniſed and examined, it would doubtleſs be found, that the complainers themſelves could alone be charged therewith.

9. The King was proceeded againſt, for intending to change the government, and render it arbitrary and tyrannical: but every Engliſhman was convinced, that the government had never been more deſpotic, more tyrannical and more arbitrary than ſince this parliament aſſembled. There was ſcarce a law but what had been violated. The two houſes had, for ſeveral years, uſurped the ſupreme authority, contrary to the known laws: and, lately, the commons had voted, that all power was lodged in them, without the concurrence of King and peers; a maxim unknown to the Engliſh, from their Monarchy's original foundation.

Charles I An' 1648.

10. The commons, in eſtabliſhing by a bare vote, that it belonged to them alone to try his Majeſty, had plainly declared, they owned neither ſuperior nor equal; which was introducing deſpotiſm in good earneſt.

11. Laſtly, 'till 1643, the parliament had only ſuſpected his Majeſty's intention to alter the government; but after the parliament had aſſumed the direction, the government was really and truly changed. The King was moreover ſuſpected of deſigning to alter the eſtabliſhed religion: but the parliament had indeed changed it, and reduced it to a deplorable confuſion, and the project of this unfortunate change had been the true cauſe of theſe wars, and of all the ſubſequent calamities.

IV. The fourth circumſtance I intend to obſerve, is, that King Charles was thrice brought before the High-court of Juſtice, and as often called upon to anſwer the charge entered againſt him, which was read in his hearing: but he conſtantly refuſed to own the authority of the court, and of thoſe who erected it. On the other hand, the court would never hear his reaſons for declining their juriſdiction: they always took for granted, that they had ſufficient authority to eſtabliſh the court, and this was the very point his Majeſty would have combated, but he was never ſuffered. Finally, ſeeing he could not prevail to be heard on that ſubject, he left his reaſons in writing to this effect.

Charles's reaſons for not owning the court's authority. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1403.

" That no earthly power could juſtly call him " (who was their King) in queſtion as a delinquent.

" That there were no proceedings juſt againſt " any man, but what were warranted, either by " God's laws, or the municipal laws of the country " where he lives. As for the proceedings againſt " him, they could not be warranted by God's " laws. For, on the contrary, it is there ſaid, " " Where the word of a King is, there is power; " and who may ſay unto him, what doſt thou? " Eccleſ. viii. 4." Then, for the law of the land, " no impeachment can lie againſt the King, they " all going in his name: and one of their maxims " is, " That the King can do no wrong." Beſide, " the law upon which they grounded their proceed- " ings, muſt either be old or new. If old, they " ought to ſhew it; if new, they ſhould tell what " authority, warranted by the fundamental laws of " the land, had made it, and when.

" How the houſe of commons could erect a " court of judicature, which was never one itſelf, " he left to God and the world to judge.

" And it was full as ſtrange, that they ſhould " pretend to make laws without King, or lords " houſe, to any who had heard ſpeak of the laws " of England. And admiting, that the people " of England's commiſſion could grant their pre- " tended power, he ſaw nothing they could ſhew " for that; for certainly they never aſked the queſ- " tion of the tenth man in the kingdom.

" That having concluded, as much as in him " lay, a treaty at Newport, and expecting the " houſe's agreement thereunto, he was ſuddenly " ſupriſed and hurried from thence as a priſoner; " that the higher-houſe, for any thing he could ſee, " was totally excluded; and for the houſe of com-

Remarkable depoſitions againſt his Majeſty. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1406.

V. Of all the witneſſes examined againſt King Charles (2), there was not (as I hinted) one who proved that Prince to have been really author of the war. But among the depoſitions, two very particular ones muſt not paſs unobſerved, ſuppoſing they were neither forged nor altered. The firſt ſhews the King was much leſs inſenſed againſt the Independents than againſt the Preſbyterians, tho' afterwards he had but too much cauſe to know, that the principles of the former were more deſtructive to him than thoſe of the latter. The ſecond ſeems to prove this Prince not to have acted with ſincerity, even in the Newport treaty.

p. 1414. * Richard Price.

A ſcrivener of London * depoſed, that the commitee of Safety being informed, that Charles was privately negociating with the Independents, ſent the deponent to Oxford, under color of carrying his Majeſty propoſals from the Independents: that he was introduced to him by the earl of Briſtol, and received orders to acquaint the leading Independents, from his Majeſty, that if they would take his part againſt the parliament, he would grant them whatever freedom they required.

p. 1413.

The ſecond depoſition was of Henry Gooche, of Grey's-inn, who ſaid: " That, on the thirtieth
" of September laſt, having acceſs to, and diſ-
" courſe with the King at Newport, he told him
" that, ſince his Majeſty had juſtified the parlia-
" ment's taking up arms, by conſenting to the pre" face of the bill, he did not queſtion, but moſt of " the Preſbyterian party, both ſoldiers and others,
" would ſtick cloſe to him." Whereto Charles replied: " That he would have all his old friends
" know, that tho' for the preſent he was con" tented to give the parliament leave to call
" their own war what they pleaſed, yet that he " neither did then, nor ever ſhould decline the " juſtice of his own cauſe." Moreover, upon the deponent's ſaying, " That his buſineſs was " much retarded thro' want of commiſſions."
The King made anſwer, " That being upon a " treaty, he would not diſhonor himſelf; but if " the deponent would go over to the Prince his
" ſon (who had full authority from him) he, or " any for him, ſhould receive whatever commiſ-
" ſions ſhould be deſired." That moreover he expreſſed much joy, that his good ſubjects would ingage themſelves for his reſtoration.

King Charles refuſing to anſwer before the High-court of Juſtice, his refuſal was, according to the laws of England, taken for a confeſſion, and ſentence of death paſſed upon him, the twenty-ſeventh of January (3). A little before his ſentence was pronounced, he earneſtly deſired to be heard before the two houſes, ſaying, he had ſomething of great importance to offer them: but his requeſt was rejected. It is generally believed, he intended to propoſe to the parliament, that he would abdicate the crown in favor of his eldeſt ſon.

Sentence pronounced upon him, and he is refuſed being heard. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1418. Welwood. Ludlow.

This ſentence was executed the thirtieth of January, 1648-9, on a ſcaffold erected in the ſtreet, under the Banqueting-houſe windows, at Whitehall (4). His Majeſty ſuffered death with exemplary conſtancy, and without ſhewing the leaſt ſigns of weakneſs or conſternation. His body, after having been for ſome days expoſed to view, in one of the chambers at Whitehall, was carried to Windſor, and buried, without any pomp, in St. George's chapel (5).

He is executed. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1428.

It is no eaſy matter to give a juſt and exact character of Charles I, amidſt the orbitant eulogeis beſtowed on him by ſome, and the calumnies wherewith others have indeavored to blacken his reputation. Had the factions, which took birth in his reign, expired alſo when he did, we might have found in the hiſtories of that time, compoſed after the troubles were over, a candidneſs and impartiality which might help to form a true judgment of this Prince's character. But theſe ſame parties continuing in the following reigns, with a mutual animoſity, it may be affirmed, that not one unbiaſſed Engliſh writer upon this ſubject is to be met with. Some had no other view than their royal maſter's juſtification; and others, whoſe aim was to juſtify the parliament, could not do it without loading that Monarch, and rendering him odious. We muſt therefore proceed with the utmoſt caution when we are in ſearch of this King's character, for fear of being miſ-led, and drawn into error, by the different repreſentations the hiſtorians have exhibited to their readers. Notwithſtanding theſe difficulties, I ſhall ſuccinctly deliver my ſentiments, free from all party-paſſion and prejudice.

King Charles's character.

I find not the commendations given to King Charles the Firſt, with regard to ſobriety, temperance and chaſtity, ever conteſted. All agree likewiſe, that he was a good huſband, a good father, and a good maſter. But ſome accuſe him, and perhaps not unjuſtly, of ſuffering his Queen to have too much aſcendant over him, and too large a ſhare in ſtate-affairs (6). The kingdom being Proteſtant, and her Majeſty a very zealous Romaniſt, her power, which ſhe greatly Juxon biſhop of London. Colonel Whichcot, the governor, not permiting the biſhop to ſay the burial-office, according to the liturgy, the body was ſilently interred, February 9, in a vault about the middle of the choir, over againſt the eleventh ſtall on the Sovereign's ſide, near Henry VIII, and Jane Seymour, with this inſcription in capital letters, on a fillet of lead, KING CHARLES, 1648. abuſed in geting the moſt important imploys confered on Papiſts, muſt have been looked on with a jealous eye. This was the chief ground of that notion ſpread about the kingdom, that the court intended to reſtore Popery in England.

Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 197.

" He was ſo great a lover of juſtice, that no " temptation could diſpoſe him to a wrongful " action, except it was ſo diſguiſed to him, " that he believed it to be juſt." Theſe are lord Clarendon's own words, which may be very true, if applied to the concerns of particular perſons. But beſide the juſtice which a King ought to adminiſter impartially, to private perſons, there is another kind of juſtice due from him, to all his people in general. With reſpect to this latter, it may juſtly be doubted, that lord Clarendon's encomium is inconſiſtent with the project of altering the conſtitution, and aſſuming a power which certainly was illegal: nay, I do not believe this to have been one of the affairs ſecreted from him; but ſhould rather think it was by him that his miniſters and courtiers framed their conduct, and adapted their notions to his, in order to make their court, and advance their fortune.

No Prince was, perhaps, ever ſo punctual and regular in his devotions, both public and private. This was of ſome uſe to him, to repel the charge of his not being well-affected to the Proteſtant religion; and he knew how to improve it occaſionally.

He abhorred all debauchery, and could not indure a profane or obſcene expreſſion. His court was very different from that of his father, where profaneneſs and obſcenity were but too much in vogue. It is hard to conceive, how the duke of Buckingham, who was inured to King James's ways, could accommodate himſelf to the gravity and ſeverity of King Charles, or how King Charles could adapt himſelf to the manners of that duke.

King James was profuſe, and his Son Charles inclined towards avarice: but this failing may be excuſed by the conſideration, that from the begining to the end of his reign he never abounded with money.

His adverſaries would repreſent him as a cruel and bloody-thirſty tyrant. But, as they have not been able to reproach him with any particular action denoting ſuch a diſpoſition, it is eaſy to perceive, this charge is founded on the ſuppoſition of his having been author of a war wherein ſo much blood was laviſhed.

Sincerity, as appears in his hiſtory, was not his favorite virtue. He made frequent uſe of mental reſervations concealed in ambiguous terms and general expreſſions, whereof he reſerved the explication for a proper place and ſeaſon. On this account, the parliament could never confide in his promiſes, wherein was always either ſome ambiguous term, or ſome reſtriction which rendered them uſeleſs. This may be ſaid to be one of the main cauſes of his ruin, becauſe giving thereby occaſion of diſtruſt, it was not poſſible to find any expedient for a pacification with his two houſes. He was thought to act with ſo little probity in his ingagements, that it was believed there was no dependence on his word. The parliament could not even reſolve to debate on this Prince's propoſitions, ſo convinced were they of his ability to hide his real intentions under equivocal expreſſions: but they ſent him their own propoſitions, with liberty only of ſaying Content, or Not Content; ſo apprehenſive were they of his explications. But as I may be taxed with overloading his ſaid Majeſty on the point of ſincerity, I think it incumbent on me, to juſtify what I advance by a moſt unexceptionable evidence: I mean the earl of Clarendon.

CHARLES I AN' 1648.

Vol. III. p. 335.

" A law inacted by violence and force (ſays " that illuſtrious hiſtorian) is not rightfully inacted, " was one of thoſe poſitions of Ariſtotle, which " has never been ſince contradicted, and was an " advantage which, being well managed, and " ſtoutly inſiſted upon, would, in ſpite of all their " machination, have brought his Majeſty's ene- " mies to a temper of being treated with. But " I have ſome cauſe to believe, that even this " argument, which was unanſwerable, for reject- " ing the bill* was applied for the confirming it; " and an opinion, that the violence and force " uſed in procuring it, rendered it abſolutely in- " valid and void, made the confirmation of it " leſs conſidered, as not being of ſtrength to " make that act good which was in itſelf null. " And I doubt this logic had an influence upon " other acts of no leſs moment than theſe.

* For excluding prelates from voting.

Let the reader judge after this, if we may boaſt of King Charles's ſincerity; ſince, even in paſſing acts of parliament, which is the moſt authentic and ſolemn promiſe a King of England can make, he gave his aſſent, merely in a belief of their being void in themſelves, and conſequently he was not bound by this ingagement. I paſs over in ſilence the manifeſt breach of the Petition of Right, perhaps upon the ſame principle, and of his many aſſurances to his parliament of his intention to maintain their privileges, which he violated within a few days, becauſe theſe matters have been ſufficiently handled in the hiſtory of his reign.

Some accuſe him of being inclined to the Romiſh creed; nay, ſome ſcruple not carrying this charge ſo high as to ſay, he intended to reſtore it in England. Theſe imputations are groundleſs. But it cannot be denied, that he gave occaſion for them by his conduct, tho' contrary to his intention. During the firſt fifteen years of his reign, Papiſts were not only ſcreened from the rigor of the law, but incouraged and countenanced, even to ſuch a degree, that he made them privy-counſellors, ſecretries of ſtate, and lords-lieutenants of counties. Two motives led him to this condeſcenſion: one, the importunities of his Queen, who was exceſſively zealous for her religion. The ſecond, his project to render himſelf abſolute, for the execution whereof he believed the aſſiſtance of the Catholics, as well Engliſh as foreigners, to be very neceſſary: but I will not affirm, that her Majeſty, and ſome of the miniſtry had not formed, with regard to religion, more extenſive projects, which they did not think proper to impart to the King. The aſſiſtance of the Papiſts, whom Charles had managed for another occaſion, became neceſſary for his own defenſe, after his breach with the parliament. How unwilling ſoever he ſeemed to receive any aid from Catholics, it is certain many were entertained in his ſervice, and that he was privately aſſiſted by thoſe of that perſuaſion on ſundry important occaſions.

Tho' it cannot be proved that he excited the Iriſh rebellion, it may however be affirmed, it was not againſt him that the Iriſh took arms, ſince they never had leſs cauſe to complain than in this and the preceding reigns: beſide the Papiſts, both Iriſh and Engliſh, always looked on this Prince as their protector, and were ever ready to aſſiſt him. Had he ſucceeded in his deſigns, in all probability, the condition of the Papiſts, both in England and Ireland, would have been abundantly happier, and the penal laws in great meaſure repealed: but it follows not that the King himſelf had any inclination to Popery, or intended its eſtabliſhment. In ſhort, that he was a ſincere member of the church of England, can ſcarcely be doubted, ſince he affirmed it on the ſcaffold, at a time when it could not have done him any ſervice to diſſemble his religion.

Many ſur-name him "The Martyr;" pretending he ſuffered death in maintenance of the Proteſtant religion's verities againſt the Preſbyterians and Independents, and call the day of his death (which is ſolemniſed annually on the thirtieth of January) the day of his Martyrdom. But there was, 1. Too great a complication of cauſes which brought him to this tragical end, to aſcribe his death ſolely to religion. 2. Admiting it fact, that religion was the ſole cauſe of his death, it would not be univerſally agreed, that he died for defending the Proteſtant faith's truths, ſince, among Proteſtants, the Engliſh alone, or rather a good many of the Engliſh, hold Epiſcopacy to be a doctrine of faith. 3. Tho' dying for Epiſcopacy was really martyrdom, King Charles, in his laſt propoſals at Newport, agreed to reduce Epiſcopacy to little more than a cypher. 4. Had he been condemned by the Preſbyterians, he might in ſome manner be deemed a ſufferer for Epiſcopacy; but it is evident the Preſbyterians had no ſhare in this ſentence, nor ever thought of bringing him to a trial: the Independents were the men who condemned and executed him; and ſurely, it was not on any religious account, but to transform the Monarchy into a Republic. 5. If the ſcrivener's evidence be true, King Charles cannot be ſaid to ſuffer death for ſupporting religion againſt the Independents; ſince, according to that man's depoſition, he offered to grant them all the liberty they deſired, if they would but take his part. Howſoever this be, the church of England, having recovered, under Charles II, the advantage ſhe had loſt in Charles I's reign, appointed the day of his death to be kept yearly with faſting and humiliation, which has induced ſome people to beſtow on this Prince the glorious title of Martyr.

Charles I An' 1648.

To conclude, King Charles the Firſt was indowed with many virtues, and noble qualities. There is even room to believe, that his failings flowed wholly from his deſign to inſlave England; and if, on ſome occaſions, he followed not exactly the rules of ſincerity, it was only in order to execute what he had undertaken with more facility. Without this unfortunate project, he might be counted one of the moſt accompliſhed Princes ever appeared on the Engliſh throne (1). The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Strafford, archbiſhop Laud, and the Queen herſelf (accuſtomed to a government very different from that of England) were the perſons who ruined this unhappy Prince, whom they paſſionately deſired to exalt to a pitch above that of his predeceſſors. But who can forbear making a very natural reflection on this ſubject? I mean, on the puniſhment of thoſe evil counſellors, and even of his ſaid Majeſty. Buckingham loſt his life by the aſſaſſinating hand of a villain: Laud, Strafford, and the King himſelf left their heads on ſcaffolds, and his Queen paſſed the reſidue of her days in a melancholy widowhood, being even ſlighted by her neareſt relatives. She however ſurvived long enough to ſee the Prince her ſon's reſtoration; but found not with him all the ſatisfaction ſhe expected, which doubtleſs occaſioned her return to France, where, in 1669, ſhe died.

(1) Dr. Welwood in his character of King Charles (Mem. p. 68, &c.) has theſe particulars, not taken notice of by our hiſtorian, viz. "He was a Prince of a comely preſenſe, of a ſweet, grave, but melancholy aſpect. His face was regular, "handſome, and well complexioned; his body ſtrong, healthy, and well-made; and, tho' of a low ſtature, was capable to "indure the greateſt fatigues. He had a good taſte of learning, and a more than ordinary ſkill in the liberal arts, eſpe- "cially painting, ſculpture, architecture, and medals; he acquired the nobleſt collection of any Prince in his time, and "more than all the Kings of England before him. He ſpake ſeveral languages very well, and with a ſingular good grace; "tho' now and then, when warm in diſcourſe, he was inclinable to ſtammer. He wrote a tolerable hand for a King; "but his ſenſe was ſtrong, and his ſtile laconic."

THE TRIAL OF CHARLES STUART * King of England,

Before the High-Court of Juſtice, for High-Treaſon, January 20--27, 1648, 24 Car. I.

ON Saturday being the twentieth day of January, 1648, the lord preſident of the High-court of Juſtice, with near fourſcore of the members of the ſaid court, having ſixteen gentlemen with partizans, and a ſword, and a mace, with their and other officers of the ſaid court, marching before them, came to the place ordered to be prepared for their ſiting at the Weſt-end of the great hall at Weſtminſter; where the lord preſident, in a crimſon-velvet chair, fixed in the midſt of the court, placed himſelf, having a deſk with a crimſon-velvet cuſhion before him; the reſt of the members placing themſelves on each ſide of him upon ſeveral ſeats, or benches, prepared and hung with ſcarlet for that purpoſe; and the partizans dividing themſelves on each ſide of the court before them.

The court being thus ſat, and ſilence made, the great gate of the ſaid hall was ſet open, to the end that all perſons, without exception, deſirous to ſee or hear, might come into it. Upon which the hall was preſently filled, and ſilence again ordered.

This done, colonel Thomlinſon, who had the charge of the priſoner, was commanded to bring him to the court; who within a quarter of an hour's ſpace brought him, attended with about twenty officers with partizans, marching before him, there being other gentlemen, to whoſe care and cuſtody he was likewiſe commited, marching in his rear.

Being thus brought up within the face of the court, the ſerjeant at arms, with his mace, received and conducted him ſtrait to the bar, having a crimſon-velvet chair ſet before him. After a ſtern looking upon the court, and the people in the galleries on each ſide of him, he placed himſelf, not at all moving his hat, or otherwiſe ſhewing the leaſt reſpect to the court; but preſently roſe up again, and turned about, looking downwards upon the guards placed on the left ſide, and on the multitude of ſpectators on the right ſide of the ſaid great hall. After ſilence made among the people, the act of parliament for the trying of Charles Stuart, King of England, was read over by the clerk of the court, who ſat on one ſide of a table covered with a rich Turkey-carpet, and placed at the feet of the ſaid lord preſident; upon which table were alſo laid the ſword and mace.

After reading the ſaid act, the ſeveral names of the commiſſioners were called over, every one who was preſent, being eighty, as aforeſaid, riſing up, and anſwering to his call.

Having again placed himſelf in his chair, with his face towards the court, ſilence being again ordered, the lord preſident ſtood up, and ſaid:

LORD PESIDENT. Charles Stuart, King of England, the commons of England aſſembled in parliament being deeply ſenſible of the calamities which have been brought upon this naton (which are fixed upon you as the principal author thereof) have reſolved to make inquiſition for blood; and according to that debt and duty they owe to juſtice, to God, the kingdom, and themſelves, and according to the fundamental power which reſts in themſelves, they have reſolved to bring you to trial and judgment; and for that purpoſe have conſtituted this High-court of Juſtice, before which you are brought.

This ſaid, mr. Cook, ſollicitor for the common-wealth (ſtanding within a bar on the right hand of the priſoner) offered to ſpeak: but the King having a ſtaff in his hand, held it up, and laid it upon the ſaid mr. Cook's ſhoulder two or three times, biding him hold. Nevertheleſs, the lord preſident ordering him to go on, he ſaid:

MR. COOK. My lord, I am commanded to charge Charles Stuart, King of England, in the name of the commons of England, with treaſon and high miſdemeanors: I deſire the ſaid charge may be read.

The ſaid charge being delivered to the clerk of the court, the lord preſident ordered it ſhould be read; but the King bid him hold. Nevertheleſs, being commanded by the lord preſident to read it, the clerk began, and the priſoner ſat down again in his chair, looking ſometimes on the High-court, ſometimes up to the galleries; and having riſen again, and turned about to behold the guards and ſpectators, ſat down, looking very ſternly, and with a countenance not at all moved, 'till theſe words, viz. "Charles Stuart to be a tyrant and traitor, "&c." were read; at which he laughed, as he ſat, in the face of the court.

The charge being read, the lord preſident replied:

LD PRES. Sir, you have now heard your charge, containing ſuch matter as appears in it; you find that, in the cloſe of it, it is prayed to the court, in the behalf of the commons of England, that you anſwer to your charge. The court expects your anſwer.

KING. I would know by what power I am called hither. I was not long ago in the iſle of Wight: how I came there, is a longer ſtory than I think it fit at this time for me to ſpeak of; but there I entered into a treaty with both houſes of parliament, with as much public faith as it is poſſible to be had of any people in the world. I treated there with a number of honorable lords and gentlemen, and treated honeſtly and uprightly: I cannot ſay but they did very nobly with me, we were upon the concluſion of the treaty. Now I would know by what authority, I mean lawful; there are many unlawful authorities in the world, thieves and robbers by the highways; but I would know by what authority I was brought from thence, and carried from place to place, and I know not what: and when I know what lawful authority, I ſhall anſwer. Remember I am your King, your lawful King, and what ſins you bring upon your heads, and the judgment of God upon this land: think well upon it, I ſay, think well upon it, before you go farther from one ſin to a greater: therefore let me know by what lawful authority I am ſeated here, and I ſhall not be unwilling to anſwer. In the mean time, I ſhall not betray my truſt: I have a truſt commited to me by God, by old and lawful deſcent, I will not betray it, to anſwer to a new unlawful authority: therefore reſolve me that, and you ſhall hear more of me.

LD PRES. If you had been pleaſed to have obſerved what was hinted to you by the court, at your firſt coming hither, you would have known by what authority; which authority requires you, in the name of the people of England, of which you are elected King, to anſwer them.

KING. No, ſir, I deny that.

LD PRES. If you acknowledge not the authority of the court, they muſt proceed.

KING. I do tell them ſo, England was never an elective kingdom, but an hereditary kingdom for near theſe thouſand years; therefore let me know by what authority I am called hither: I do ſtand more for the liberty of my people, than any here who come to be my pretended judges; and therefore let me know by what lawful authority I am ſeated here, and I will anſwer it; otherwiſe I will not anſwer it.

LD PRES. Sir, how really you have managed your truſt, is known: your way of anſwer is to interrogate the court, which beſeems you not in this condition. You have been told of it twice or thrice.

KING. Here is a gentleman, lieutenant-colonel Cobbet; aſk him, if he did not bring me from the iſle of Wight by force. I do not come here as ſubmiting to the court: I will ſtand as much for the privilege of the houſe of commons, rightly underſtood, as any man here whatſoever. I ſee no houſe of lords here, which may conſtitute a parliament; and the King too ſhould have been. Is this the bringing the King to his parliament? Is this the bringing an end to the treaty in the public faith of the world? Let me ſee a legal authority warranted by the word of God, the ſcriptures, or warranted by the conſtitutions of the kingdom, and I will anſwer.

LD PRES. Sir, you have propounded a queſtion, and have been anſwered. Seeing you will not anſwer, the court will conſider how to proceed: in the mean time, they who brought you hither, are to take charge of you back again. The court deſires to know, whether this be all the anſwer you will give, or no.

KING. Sir, I deſire that you would give me, and all the world, ſatisfaction in this: let me tell you, it is not a ſlight thing you are about. I am ſworn to keep the peace, by that duty I owe to God and my country, and I will do it to the laſt breath of my body; and therefore you ſhall do well to ſatisfy firſt God, and then the country, by what authority you do it: if you do it by uſurped authority, you cannot anſwer. There is a God in heaven that will call you, and all who give you power, to account. Satisfy me in that, and I will anſwer; otherwiſe I betray my truſt, and the liberties of the people: and therefore think of that, and then I ſhall be willing: for I do avow, that it is as a great ſin to withſtand lawful authority, as it is to ſubmit to a tyrannical, or any other ways unlawful authority; and therefore ſatisfy me that, and you ſhall receive my anſwer.

LD PRES. The court expects you ſhould give them a final anſwer: their purpoſe is to adjourn to Monday next. If you do not ſatisfy yourſelf, tho' we do tell you our authority; we are ſatisfied with our authority, and it is upon God's authority and the kingdom's; and that peace you ſpeak of will be kept in the doing of juſtice, and that's our preſent work.

KING. For anſwer, let me tell you, you have ſhewn no lawful authority to ſatisfy any reaſonable man.

LD PRES. That is in your apprehenſion; we are ſatisfied, who are your judges.

KING. It is not my apprehenſion, nor yours neither, which ought to decide it.

LD PRES. The court hath heard you, and you are to be diſpoſed of as they have commanded.

The court adjourns to the Painted-chamber, on Monday at ten in the fore-noon, and thence hither.

It is to be obſerved, That as the charge was reading againſt the King, the head of his ſtaff fell off, which he wondered at; and ſeeing none to take it up, he ſtooped for it himſelf.

As the King went away, facing the court, he ſaid, I do not fear that; meaning the ſword: The people in the hall, as he went down the ſtairs, cryed out, ſome, God ſave the King!: but moſt for Juſtice.

At the High-court of Juſtice ſiting in Weſtminſter-hall, Monday Jan. 22. 1648.

OYes made; ſilence commanded; the court called, and anſwered to their names.

Silence commanded upon pain of impriſonment, and the captain of the guard to apprehend all ſuch as made diſturbance.

Upon the King's coming, a ſhout was made.

Command given, by the court, to the captain of the guard, to fetch and take into his cuſtody thoſe who made any diſturbance.

MR. SOLLICITOR. May it pleaſe your lordſhip, my lord preſident. I did at the laſt court, in the behalf of the commons of England, exhibit and give into this court a charge of high-treaſon, and other high crimes againſt the priſoner at the bar; whereof I do accuſe him in the name of the people of England: and the charge was read unto him, and his anſwer required. My lord, he was not then pleaſed to give any anſwer; but inſtead of anſwering, did diſpute the authority of this High-court. My humble motion to this High-court, in behalf of the kingdom of England, is, That the priſoner may be directed to make a poſitive anſwer, either by way of confeſſion or negation; which if he ſhall refuſe to do, that the matter of the charge may be taken "pro confeſſo," and the court may proceed according to juſtice.

LD PRES. Sir, you may remember, at the laſt court, you was told the occaſion of your being brought hither, and you heard a charge read againſt you, containing a charge of high-treaſon, and other high crimes againſt this realm of England: you heard likewiſe, that it was prayed, in the behalf of the people, that you ſhould give an anſwer to that charge, that thereupon ſuch proceedings might be had as ſhould be agreeable to juſtice. You were then pleaſed to make ſome ſcruples concerning the authority of this court, and knew not by what authority you were brought hither; you did diverſe times propound your queſtions, and were as often anſwered, That it was by authority of the commons of England, aſſembled in parliament, who did think fit to call you to account for thoſe high and capital miſdemeanors wherewith you were then charged. Since that the court hath taken into conſideration what you then ſaid, they are fully ſatisfied with their own authority, and they hold it fit you ſhould ſtand ſatisfied with it too; and they do require it, that you do give a poſitive and particular anſwer to this charge which is exhibited againſt you; they do expect you ſhould either confeſs or deny it: if you deny, it is offered, in the behalf of the kingdom, to be made good againſt you. Their authority they do avow to the whole world, that the whole kingdom are to reſt ſatisfied in, and you are to reſt ſatisfied with it: and therefore you are to loſe no more time, but to give a poſitive anſwer thereunto.

KING. When I was here laſt, it is very true, I made that queſtion: and truly if it were only my own particular caſe, I would have ſatisfied myſelf with the proteſtation I made, the laſt time I was here, againſt the legality of this court, and that a King cannot be tried by any ſuperior juriſdiction on earth. But it is not my caſe alone, it is the freedom and liberty of the people of England; and, do you pretend what you will, I ſtand more for their liberties. For if power without law may make laws, may alter the fundamental laws of the kingdom, I do not know what ſubject he is in England, who can be ſure of his life, or any thing he calls his own: therefore when I came here, I did expect particular reaſons to know by what law, what authority you did proceed againſt me here; and therefore I am a little to ſeek what to ſay to you in this particular, becauſe the affirmative is to be proved, the negative often is very hard to do: but ſince I cannot perſuade you to do it, I ſhall tell you my reaſons, as ſhort as I can.

My

My reaſons why, in conſcience and the duty I owe to God firſt, and my people next for the preſervation of their lives, liberties and eſtates, I conceive I cannot anſwer this, 'till I be ſatisfied of the legality of it.

All proceedings againſt any man whatſoever ———

LD PRES. Sir, I muſt interrupt you, which I would not do, but that what you do is not agreeable to the proceedings of any court of juſtice: you are about to enter into argument, and diſpute concerning the authority of this court, before whom you appear as a priſoner, and are charged as a high delinquent; if you take upon you to diſpute the authority of the court, we may not do it, nor will any court give way unto it: you are to ſubmit unto it, you are to give a punctual and direct anſwer, whether you will anſwer your charge or no, and what your anſwer is.

KING. Sir, by your favor, I do not know the forms of law; I do know law and reaſon, tho' I am no lawyer profeſſed, but I know as much law as any gentleman in England; and therefore (under favor) I do plead for the liberties of the people of England more than you do: and therefore, if I ſhould impoſe a belief upon any man, without reaſons given for it, it were unreaſonable; but I muſt tell you, that the reaſon I have, as thus informed, I cannot yield unto it.

LD PRES. Sir, I muſt interrupt you, you may not be permited: you ſpeak of law and reaſon; it is fit there ſhould be law and reaſon, and there are both againſt you. Sir, the vote of the commons of England, aſſembled in parliament, is the reaſon of the kingdom, and they are theſe who have given to that law, according to which you ſhould have ruled and reigned. Sir, you are not to diſpute our authority, you are told it again by the court. Sir, it will be taken notice of, that you ſtand in contempt of the court, and your contempt will be recorded accordingly.

KING. I do not know how a King can be a delinquent; but by any law I ever heard of, all men (delinquents, or what you will) let me tell you they may put in demurrers againſt any proceeding as legal: and I do demand that, and demand to be heard with my reaſons; if you deny that, you deny reaſon.

LD PRES. Sir, you have offered ſomething to the court; I ſhall ſpeak ſomething unto you, the ſenſe of the court. Sir, neither you nor any man are permited to diſpute that point; you are excluded; you may not demur to the juriſdiction of the court: if you do, I muſt let you know, that they over-rule your demurrer. They ſit here by the authority of the commons of England, and all your predeceſſors, and you are reſponſible to them.

KING. I deny that, ſhew me one precedent.

LD PRES. Sir, you ought not to interrupt while the court is ſpeaking to you. This point is not to be debated by you, neither will the court permit you to do it; if you offer it by way of demurrer to the juriſdiction of the court, they have conſidered of their juriſdiction; they do affirm their own juriſdiction.

KING. I ſay ſir, by your favor, that the commons of England were never a court of judicature; I would know how they came to be ſo.

LD PRES. Sir, you are not permited to go on in that ſpeech, and theſe diſcourſes.

Then the clerk of the court read as follows.

" Charles Stuart, King of England, you have been accuſed, " on the behalf of the people of England, of high treaſon, " and other high crimes; the court have determined that you " ought to anſwer the ſame."

KING. I will anſwer the ſame ſo ſoon as I know, by what authority you do this.

LD PRES. If this be all you will ſay, then, gentlemen, you who brought the priſoner hither, take charge of him back again.

KING. I do require that I may give in my reaſons why I do not anſwer, and give me time for that.

LD PRES. Sir, it is not for priſoners to require.

KING. Priſoners! Sir, I am not an ordinary priſoner.

LD PRES. The court hath conſidered of their juriſdiction, and they have already affirmed their juriſdiction; if you will not anſwer, we ſhall give order to record your default.

KING. You never heard my reaſons yet.

LD PRES. Sir, your reaſons are not to be heard againſt the higheſt juriſdiction.

KING. Shew me that juriſdiction where reaſon is not to be heard.

LD PRES. Sir, we ſhew it you here, the commons of England; and next time you are brought, you will know more of the pleaſure of the court; and, it may be, their final determination.

KING. Shew me where ever the houſe of commons was a court of judicature of that kind.

LD PRES. Serjeant, take away the priſoner.

KING. Well, ſir; remember that the King is not ſuffered to give in his reaſons for the liberty and freedom of all his ſubjects.

LD PRES. Sir, you are not to have liberty to uſe this language: how great a friend you have been to the laws and liberties of the people, let all England and the world judge.

KING. Sir, under favor, it was the liberty, freedom and laws of the ſubject, that ever I took —— defended myſelf with arms; I never took up arms againſt the people, but for the laws.

LD PRES. The command of the court muſt be obeyed; no anſwer will be given to the charge.

KING. Well, ſir!

And ſo he was guarded forth to ſir Robert Cotton's houſe.

Then the court adjourned to the Painted-chamber on Tueſday at twelve o'clock, and from thence to Weſtminſter-hall; at which time all perſons concerned were to give their attendance.

At the High-court of Juſtice ſiting in Weſtminſter-hall, Tueſday Jan. 23, 1648.

OYes made, ſilence commanded, the court called, ſeventy three perſons preſent.

The King came in with his guard, looked with an auſtere countenance upon the court, and ſat down.

The ſecond O yes made, and ſilence commanded.

MR. COOK, ſollicitor-general. May it pleaſe your lordſhip, my lord preſident. This is now the third time, that by the great grace and favor of this High-court, the priſoner hath been brought to the bar, before any iſſue joined in the cauſe. My lord, I did at the firſt court exhibit a charge againſt him, containing the higheſt treaſon was ever wrought upon the theater of England; That a King of England, truſted to keep the law, who had taken an oath ſo to do, who had tribute paid him for that end, ſhould be guilty of a wicked deſign to ſubvert and deſtroy our laws, and introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government, in defiance of the parliament and their authority, ſet up his ſtandard for war againſt his parliament and people: and I did humbly pray, in the behalf of the people of England, that he might ſpeedily be required to make anſwer to the charge.

But, my lord, inſtead of making any anſwer, he did then diſpute the authority of this High-court. Your lordſhip was pleaſed to give him a farther day to conſider, and put in his anſwer; which day being yeſterday, I did humbly move, that he might be required to give a direct and poſitive anſwer, either by denying or confeſſing it: but, my lord, he was then pleaſed to demur to the juriſdiction of the court; which the court did then over-rule, and command him to give a direct and poſitive anſwer. My lord, beſide this great delay of juſtice, I ſhall now humbly move your lordſhip for ſpeedy judgment againſt him. My lord, I might preſs your lordſhip upon the whole, that, according to the known rules of the law of this land, That if a priſoner ſhall ſtand as contumacious in contempt, and ſhall not put in an iſſuable plea, guilty or not guilty of the charge given againſt him, whereby he may come to a fair trial; that, as by an implicit confeſſion, it may be taken 'pro confeſſo,' as it hath been done to thoſe who have deſerved more favor than the priſoner at the bar has done. But beſide, my lord, I ſhall humbly preſs your lordſhip upon the whole fact. The houſe of commons, the ſupreme authority and juriſdiction of the kingdom, they have declared, that it is notorious, that the matter of the charge is true, as it is in truth, my lord, as clear as chryſtal, and as the ſun which ſhines at noon-day: which if your lordſhip and the court be not ſatisfied in, I have notwithſtanding, on the people of England's behalf, ſeveral witneſſes to produce. And therefore I do humbly pray, and yet I muſt confeſs it is not ſo much I, as the innocent blood which hath been ſhed, the cry whereof is very great for juſtice and judgment; and therefore I do humbly pray, that ſpeedy judgment be pronounced againſt the priſoner at the bar.

LD

LD PRES. Sir, you have heard what is moved by the counſel on the behalf of the kingdom againſt you. Sir, you may well remember, and if you do not, the court cannot forget, what dilatory dealings the court hath found at your hands. You were pleaſed to propound ſome queſtions, you have had your reſolution upon them. You were told over and over again, That the court did affirm their own juriſdiction; that it was not for you, nor any other man, to diſpute the juriſdiction of the ſupreme and higheſt authority of England, from which there is no appeal, and touching which there muſt be no diſpute: yet you did perſiſt in ſuch carriage, as you gave no manner of obedience, nor did you acknowledge any authority in them, nor the High-court which conſtituted this court of Juſtice.

Sir, I muſt let you know from the court, that they are very ſenſible of theſe delays of yours, and that they ought not, being thus authoriſed by the ſupreme court of England, to be thus trifled withal; and that they might in juſtice, if they pleaſed, and according to the rules of juſtice, take advantage of theſe delays, and proceed to pronounce judgment againſt you: yet nevertheleſs they are pleaſed to give direction, and on their behalfs I do require you, that you make a poſitive anſwer unto this charge which is againſt you, ſir, in plain terms, for juſtice knows no reſpect of perſons; you are to give your poſitive and final anſwer in plain Engliſh, whether you be guilty, or not guilty, of theſe treaſons laid to your charge.

The King, after a little pauſe, ſaid,

KING. When I was here yeſterday, I did deſire to ſpeak for the liberties of the people of England; I was interrupted: I deſire to know yet, whether I may ſpeak freely or not.

LD PRES. Sir, you have had the reſolution of the court upon the like queſtion the laſt day, and you were told, that, having ſuch a charge of ſo high a nature againſt you, and your work was that you ought to acknowledge the juriſdiction of the court, and to anſwer to your charge. Sir, if you anſwer to your charge, which the court gives you leave now to do, tho' they might have taken the advantage of your contempt; yet if you be able to anſwer to your charge, when you have once anſwered, you ſhall be heard at large, make the beſt defenſe you can. But, ſir, I muſt let you know from the court, as their commands, that you are not to be permited to iſſue out into any other diſcourſes, 'till ſuch time as you have given a poſitive anſwer concerning the matter which is charged upon you.

KING. For the charge, I value it not a ruſh, it is the liberty of the people of England I ſtand for. For me to acknowledge a new court which I never heard of before, I who am your King, who ſhould be an example to all the people of England for to uphold juſtice, to maintain the old laws; indeed I do not know how to do it. You ſpake very well the firſt day I came here (on Saturday) of the obligations I had laid upon me by God, to the maintenance of the liberties of my people; the ſame obligation you ſpake of, I do acknowledge to God that I owe to him, and to my people, to defend as much as in me lies the ancient laws of the kingdom: therefore until I may know that this is not againſt the fundamental laws of the kingdom, by your favor, I can put in no particular * charge. If you will give me time, I will ſhew you my reaſons, why I cannot do it, and this———

* This is as the King expreſſed it, but I ſuppoſe he meaned anſwer.

Here being interrupted, he ſaid,

By your favor, you ought not to interrupt me: how I came here I know not, there is no law for it to make your King your priſoner. I was in a treaty upon the public faith of the kingdom, that was the known——two houſes of parliament, which was the repreſentative of the kingdom; and when I had almoſt made an end of the treaty, then I was hurried away, and brought hither: and therefore———

Here the lord preſident ſaid, ſir, you muſt know the pleaſure of the court.

KING. By your favor, ſir.

LD PRES. Nay, ſir, by your favor, you may not be permited to fall into thoſe diſcourſes; you appear as a delinquent; you have not acknowledged the authority of the court; the court craves it not of you: but once more they command you to give your poſitive anſwer——Clerk, do your duty.

KING. Duty, ſir!

The clerk reads.

" Charles Stuart, King of England, you are accuſed, in the " behalf of the commons of England, of diverſe high crimes " and treaſons, which charge hath been read unto you; the " court now requires you to give your poſitive and final an- " ſwer, by way of confeſſion, or denial of the charge.

KING. Sir, I ſay again to you, ſo that I might give ſatisfaction to the people of England of the clearneſs of my proceeding, not by way of anſwer, not in this way, but to ſatisfy them that I have done nothing againſt that truſt which hath been commited to me, I would do it: but to acknowledge a new court, againſt their privileges, to alter the fundamental laws of the kingdom, ſir you muſt excuſe me.

LD PRES. Sir, this is the third time you have publicly diſowned this court, and put an affront upon it: how far you have preſerved the privileges of the people, your actions have ſpoke it; but truly, ſir, mens intentions ought to be known by their actions; you have written your meaning in bloody characters throughout the whole kingdom. But, ſir, you underſtand the pleaſure of the court.——Clerk, record the default.——And gentlemen, you who took charge of the priſoner, take him back again.

KING. I will only ſay this one word more to you: if it were only my own particular, I would not ſay any more, nor interrupt you.

LD PRES. Sir, you have heard the pleaſure of the court, and you are (notwithſtanding you will not underſtand it) to find that you are before a Court of Juſtice.

Then the King went forth with his guard, and proclamation was made, That all perſons who had then appeared, and had farther to do at the court, might depart into the Painted-chamber; to which place the court did forthwith adjourn, and intended to meet in Weſtminſter-hall by ten next morning.

Cryer. God bleſs the kingdom of England.

Wedneſday, January 24th, 1648.

THIS day it was expected the High-court of Juſtice would have met in Weſtminſter-hall, about ten o'clock; but at the time appointed, one of the uſhers, by direction of the court (then ſiting in the Painted-chamber) gave notice to the people there aſſembled, That, in regard the court was then upon the examination of witneſſes, in relation to preſent affairs, in the Painted-chamber, they could not ſit there; but all perſons appointed to be there, were to appear upon farther ſummons.

The proceedings of the High-court of Juſtice, ſiting in Weſtminſter-hall, on Saturday the twenty-ſeventh of January, 1648.

OYes made; ſilence commanded; the court called: ſerjeant Bradſhaw lord preſident (in a ſcarlet robe) with ſixty-eight other members of the court.

As the King came in, a cry was made in the hall for Execution! Juſtice! Execution!

KING. I ſhall deſire a word to be heard a little, and I hope I ſhall give no occaſion of interruption.

LD PRES. You may anſwer in your time, hear the court firſt.

KING. If it pleaſe you, ſir, I deſire to be heard, and I ſhall not give any occaſion of interruption, and it is only in a word: a ſudden judgment———

LD PRES. Sir, you ſhall be heard in due time, but you are to hear the court firſt.

KING. Sir, I deſire, it will be in order to what I believe the court will ſay; and therefore, ſir, a haſty judgment is not ſo ſoon recalled.

LD PRES. Sir, you ſhall be heard before the judgment is given, and in the mean time you may forbear.

KING. Well, ſir, ſhall I be heard before the judgment is given?

LD PRES. Gentlemen, it is well known to all, or moſt of you here preſent, that the priſoner at the bar hath been ſeveral times convened and brought before the court to make anſwer to a charge of treaſon, and other high crimes exhibited againſt him in the name of the people of * England; to which charge being required to anſwer, he hath been ſo far from obeying the commands of the court by ſubmiting to their juſtice, as he began to take upon him to offer reaſoning and debate unto the authority of the court, and of the higheſt court which conſtituted them to try and judge him: but being over-ruled in that, and required to make his anſwer, he was ſtill pleaſed to continue contumacious, contumacious, and to refuſe to ſubmit or anſwer. Hereupon the court, that they may not be wanting to themſelves, to the truſt repoſed in them, nor that any man's wilfulneſs prevent juſtice, have thought fit to take the matter into their conſideration: they have conſidered of the charge, they have conſidered of the contumacy, and of that confeſſion which, in law, does ariſe upon that contumacy: they have likewiſe conſidered of the notoriety of the fact charged upon this priſoner, and upon the whole matter they are reſolved, and have agreed upon a ſentence to be now pronounced againſt this priſoner: but in reſpect he does deſire to be heard, before the ſentence be read and pronounced, the court has reſolved, that they will hear him. Yet, ſir, thus much I muſt tell you before-hand, which you have been minded of at other courts, that if what you have to ſay be to offer any debate concerning juriſdiction, you are not to be heard in it; you have offered it formerly, and you have indeed ſtruck at the root, that is, the power and ſupreme authority of the commons of England, which this court will not admit a debate of; and which indeed is an irrational thing in them to do, being a court which acts upon authority derived from them, that they ſhould preſume to judge upon their ſuperior, from whom there is no appeal. But, ſir, if you have any thing to ſay in defenſe of yourſelf, concerning the matter charged, the court has given me in command to let you know they will hear you.

* Here a malignant lady (lady Fairfax) interrupted the court, ſaying, 'Not half 'the people;' but ſhe was ſoon ſilenced.

KING. Since I ſee that you will not hear any thing of debate concerning that which I confeſs I thought moſt material for the peace of the kingdom, and for the liberty of the ſubject, I ſhall wave it; I ſhall ſpeak nothing to it, but only I muſt tell you that, this many a day, all things have been taken away from me, but that which I call more dear to me than my life, which is my conſcience and my honor: and if I had reſpect to my life more than the peace of the kingdom, the liberty of the ſubject, certainly I ſhould have made a particular defenſe for myſelf; for by that at leaſtwiſe I might have delayed an ugly ſentence, which I believe will paſs upon me. Therefore certainly, ſir, as a man, who hath ſome underſtanding, ſome knowledge of the world, if that my true zeal to my country had not over-borne the care I have of my own preſervation, I ſhould have gone another way to work than that I have done. Now, ſir, I conceive that a haſty ſentence once paſſed, may ſooner be repented than recalled; and truly, the ſelf-ſame deſire which I have for the peace of the kingdom, and the liberty of the ſubject, more than my own particular, does make me now at laſt deſire that, having ſomething for to ſay which concerns both, I deſire, before ſentence be given, that I may be heard in the Painted-chamber before the lords and commons. This delay cannot be prejudicial to you, whatſoever I ſay; if that I ſay no reaſon, thoſe who hear me muſt be judges; I cannot be judge of that which I have: if it be reaſon, and really for the welfare of the kingdom, and the liberty of the ſubject, I am ſure on it, very well it is worth the hearing; therefore I do conjure you, as you love that which you pretend, I hope it is real, the liberty of the ſubject, the peace of the kingdom, that you will grant me the hearing, before any ſentence be paſſed. I only deſire this, that you will take this into your conſideration; it may be you have not heard of it before-hand; if you will, I will retire, and you may think of it: but if I cannot get this liberty, I do here proteſt, that ſo fair ſhews of liberty and peace, are pure ſhews, and not otherwiſe, ſince you will not hear your King.

LD PRES. Sir, you have now ſpoken.

KING. Yes, ſir.

LD PRES. And this which you have ſaid is a farther declining of the juriſdiction of this court, which was the thing wherein you were limited before.

KING. Pray excuſe me, ſir, for my interruption, becauſe you miſtake me: it is not a declining of it, you do judge me before you hear me ſpeak. I ſay it will not, I do not decline it, tho' I cannot acknowledge the juriſdiction of the court: yet, ſir, in this give me leave to ſay, I would do it, tho' I do not by this acknowledge it; I do proteſt it is not the declining of it, ſince I ſay, if that I do ſay any thing but that which is for the peace of the kingdom, and the liberty of the ſubject, then the ſhame is mine. Now I deſire, that you will take this into your conſideration; if you will, I will withdraw.

LD PRES. Sir, this is not altogether new which you have moved unto us; not altogether new to us, tho' it is the firſt time in perſon you have offered it to the court. Sir, you ſay you do not decline the juriſdiction of the court.

KING. Not in this, which I have ſaid.

LD PRES. I underſtand you well, ſir: but nevertheleſs that which you have offered ſeems to be contrary to that ſaying of yours; for the court are ready to give a ſentence. It is not as you ſay, That they will not hear their King; for they have been ready to hear you; they have patiently waited your pleaſure for three courts together, to hear what you would ſay to the peoples charge againſt you, to which you have not vouchſafed to give any anſwer at all. Sir, this tends to a farther delay: truly, ſir, ſuch delays as theſe, neither may the kingdom, nor juſtice well bear; you have had three ſeveral days to have offered in this kind what you would have pleaſed. This court is founded upon that authority of the commons of England, in whom reſts the ſupreme juriſdiction; that which you now tender, is to have another juriſdiction, and a co-ordinate juriſdiction. I know very well you expreſs yourſelf, ſir, that notwithſtanding that you would offer to the lords and commons in the Painted-chamber, yet nevertheleſs you would proceed on here, I did hear you ſay ſo. But, ſir, that you would offer there, whatever it is, it muſt needs be in delay of the juſtice here; ſo as if this court be reſolved, and prepared for the ſentence, this which you offer they are not bound in juſtice to grant: but, ſir, according to what you ſeem to deſire, and becauſe you ſhall know the farther pleaſure of the court upon that which you have moved, the court will withdraw for a time.

KING. Shall I withdraw?

LD PRES. Sir, you ſhall know the pleaſure of the court preſently.—— The court withdraws for half an hour into the court of Wards.

SERJEANT at ARMS. The court gives command, that the priſoner be withdrawn; and they give order for his return again.

The court withdraws for half an hour, and returns.

LD PRES. Serjeant at arms, ſend for your priſoner.

Sir, you were pleaſed to make a motion here to the court to offer a deſire of yours, touching the propounding of ſomewhat to the lords in the Painted-chamber, for the peace of the kingdom. Sir, you did, in effect, receive an anſwer before the court adjourned: truly, ſir, their withdrawing and adjournment was 'pro formâ tantum;' for it did not ſeem to them, that there was any difficulty in the thing: they have conſidered of what you have moved, and have conſidered of their own authority, which is founded, as has been often ſaid, upon the ſupreme authority of the commons of England aſſembled in parliament: the court acts according to their commiſſion. Sir, the return I have to you from the court, is this: That they have been too much delayed by you already, and this which you now offer has occaſioned ſome little farther delay; and they are judges appointed by the higheſt judges; and "Judges are no more to delay, than they are to deny Juſtice:" they are good words in the great old Charter of England; "Nulli negabimus, nulli vendemus, nulli differemus Juſti-"tiam." There muſt be no delay; but the truth is, ſir, and ſo every man here obſerves it, that you have much delayed them in your contempt and default, for which they might long ſince have proceeded to judgment againſt you; and notwithſtanding what you have offered, they are reſolved to proceed to puniſhment, and to judgment, and that is their unai mous reſolution.

KING. Sir, I know it is in vain for me to diſpute: I am no Sceptick, for to deny the power which you have; I know that you have power enough: ſir, I confeſs, I think it would have been for the kingdom's peace, if you would have taken the pains to have ſhewn the lawfulneſs of your power; for this delay which I have deſired, I confeſs it is a delay; but it is a delay very important for the peace of the kingdom: for it is not my perſon which I look on alone; it is the kingdom's welfare, and the kingdom's peace; it is an old ſentence, That we ſhould think long, before we reſolve of great matters. Therefore, ſir, I do ſay again, that I do put at your doors all the inconveniency of a haſty ſentence. I confeſs I have been here now, I think, this week; this day eight days was the day I came here firſt; but a little delay of a day or two farther may give peace; whereas a haſty judgment may bring on that trouble and perpetual inconveniency to the kingdom, which the child who is unborn may repent it: and therefore again, out of the duty I owe to God, and to my country, I do deſire that I may be heard, by the lords and commons, in the Painted-chamber, or any other chamber which you will appoint me.

LD PRES. Sir, you have been already anſwered to what you even now moved, being the ſame you moved before, ſince the reſolution and the judgment of the court in it: and the court now requires to know, whether you have any more to ſay for yourſelf, than you have ſaid, before they proceed to ſentence?

KING. I ſay this, ſir, That if you will hear me, if you will give but this delay, I doubt not but I ſhall give ſome ſatisfaction to you all here, and to my people after that; and therefore I do require you, as you will anſwer it at the dreadful day of judgment, that you will conſider it once again.

LD PRES. Sir, I have received direction from the court.

KING. Well, ſir.

LD PRES. If this muſt be re-inforced, or any thing of this nature, your anſwer muſt be the ſame; and they will proceed to ſentence, if you have nothing more to ſay.

KING. Sir, I have nothing more to ſay, but I ſhall deſire, that this may be entered what I have ſaid.

LD. PRES. The court then, ſir, has ſomething elſe to ſay to you; which, altho' I know it will be very unacceptable, yet notwithſtanding they are willing, and are reſolved to diſcharge their duty.

Sir, you ſpeak very well of a precious thing, which you call peace: and it had been much to be wiſhed, that God had put it into your heart, that you had as effectually and really indeavored and ſtudied the peace of the kingdom, as now in words you ſeem to pretend: but, as you was told the other day, actions muſt expound intentions; yet actions have been clean contrary. And truly, ſir, it does appear plainly enough to them, that you have gone upon very erroneous principles: the kingdom has felt it to their ſmart; and it will be no eaſe to you to think of it: for, ſir, you have held yourſelf, and let fall ſuch language, as if you had been no ways ſubject to the law, or that the law had not been your ſuperior. Sir, the court is very ſenſible of it, and I hope ſo are all the underſtanding people of England, that the law is your ſuperior; that you ought to have ruled according to the law; you ought to have done ſo. Sir, I know very well your pretenſe has been, that you have done ſo; but, ſir, the difference has been, who ſhall be the expoſitors of this law: ſir, whether you and your party, out of courts of juſtice, ſhall take upon them to expound law, or the courts of juſtice, who are the expounders? Nay, the Sovereign and the High-court of Juſtice, the parliament of England, which are not only the higheſt expounders, but the ſole makers of the law? Sir, for you to ſet yourſelf with your ſingle judgment, and thoſe who adhere unto you, to ſet yourſelf againſt the higheſt court of juſtice, that is not law. Sir, as the law is your ſuperior, ſo truly, ſir, there is ſomething which is ſuperior to the law, and which is indeed the parent or author of the law, and that is the people of England: for, ſir, as they are thoſe who at the firſt (as other countries have done) did chuſe to themſelves this form of government, even for juſtice ſake, that juſtice might be adminiſtered, that peace might be preſerved; ſo, ſir, they gave laws to their governors, according to which they ſhould govern: and if thoſe laws ſhould have proved inconvenient or prejudicial to the public, they had a power in them, and reſerved to themſelves, to alter as they ſhall ſee cauſe. Sir, it is very true, what ſome of your ſide have ſaid, "Rex non habet parem in regno," ſo they: This court will ſay the ſame, while King, that you have not your peer in ſome ſenſe, for you are "major ſingulis;" but they will aver again, that you are "minor uni-verſis." And the ſame author tells you, that "non debet eſſe major eo in regno ſuo in exhibitione juris, "minimus autem eſſe debet in judicio ſuſcipiendo."

Bract. de leg. lib. 1. c. 8.

This we know to be law, "Rex habet ſuperiorem, Deum "& Legem, etiam & Curiam;" ſo ſays the ſame author. And truly, ſir, he makes bold to go a little farther, "Debent "ei ponere frænum:" they ought to bridle him. And, ſir, we know very well the ſtories of old: thoſe wars which were called the Barons War, when the nobility of the land did ſtand out for the liberty and property of the ſubject, and would not ſuffer the Kings, who did invade, to play the tyrants freer, but called them to account for it; we know that truth, that they did "frænum ponere." But, ſir, if they do forbear to do their duty now, and are not ſo mindful of their own honor, and the kingdom's good, as the barons of England of old were, certainly the commons of England will not be unmindful of what is for their preſervation, and for their ſafety; "Juſtitiæ "fruendi cauſa Reges conſtituti ſunt." This we learn; the end of having Kings, or any other governors, it is for the injoying of juſtice; that is the end. Now, ſir, if ſo be the King will go contrary to that end, or any other governor will go contrary to the end of his government; ſir, he muſt underſtand, that he is but an officer in truſt, and he ought to diſcharge that truſt; and they are to take order for the animadverſion and puniſhment of ſuch an offending governor.

This is not law of yeſterday, ſir (ſince the time of the diviſion betwixt you and your people) but it is law of old. And we know very well the authors and the authorities which do tell us what the law was in that point upon the election of Kings, upon the oath which they took unto their people: and if they did not obſerve it, there were thoſe things called parliaments; the parliaments were they who were to adjudge (the very words of the author) the plaints and wrongs done of the King and the Queen, or their children; ſuch wrongs eſpecially, when the people could have no where elſe any remedy. Sir, that has been the people of England's caſe: they could not have their remedy elſewhere but in parliament.

Sir, parliaments were ordained for that purpoſe, to redreſs the grievances of the people; that was their main end. And truly, ſir, if ſo be that the kingdom of England had been rightly mindful of themſelves, they were never more in majeſty and ſtate than in the parliament: but how forgetful ſome have been, ſtories have told us: We have a miſerable, a lamentable, a ſad experience of it. Sir, by the old laws of England, I ſpeak theſe things the rather to you, becauſe you were pleaſed to let fall the other day, you thought you had as much knowledge in the law as moſt gentlemen in England: it is very well, ſir. And truly, ſir, it is very fit for the gentlemen of England to underſtand that law under which they muſt live, and by which they muſt be governed. And then, ſir, the ſcripture ſays, "They who know their maſter's will and do it not:" what follows? The law is your maſter; the acts of parliament.

The parliaments were to be kept anciently, we find in our old author, twice in the year, that the ſubject, upon any occaſion, might have a ready remedy and redreſs for his grievance. Afterwards, by ſeveral acts of parliament, in the days of your predeceſſor Edward the Third, they ſhould have been once a year. Sir, what the intermiſſion of parliaments has been in your time it is very well known, and the ſad conſequences of it; and what in the interim, inſtead of theſe parliaments, has been by you by a high and arbitrary hand introduced upon the people, that likewiſe has been too well known and felt. But when God, by his providence, had ſo far brought it about, that you could no longer decline the calling a parliament, ſir, yet it will appear, what your ends were againſt the ancient and your native kingdom of Scotland: the parliament of England not ſerving your ends againſt them, you were pleaſed to diſſolve it. Another great neceſſity occaſioned the calling of this parliament; and what your deſigns, and plots, and indeavors all along have been, for the cruſhing and confounding of this parliament, has been very notorious to the whole kingdom. And truly, ſir, in that you did ſtrike all; that had been a ſure way to have brought about that which this charge lays upon you, your intention to ſubvert the fundamental laws of the land: for the great bulwark of the liberties of the people is the parliament of England; and to ſubvert and root up that, which your aim has been to do, certainly, at one blow, you had confounded the liberties and the property of England.

Truly, ſir, it makes me call to mind; I cannot forbear to expreſs it; for, ſir, we muſt deal plainly with you, according to the merits of your cauſe, ſo is our commiſſion: it makes me call to mind theſe proceedings of yours that which we read of a great Roman Emperor (by the way let us call him a great Roman Tyrant) Caligula, who wiſhed who the people of Rome had but one neck, that at one blow he might cut it off. And your proceedings have been ſomewhat like this: for the body of the people of England has been (and where elſe) repreſented but in the parliament; and could you have but confounded that, you had at one blow cut off the neck of England. But God has reſerved better things for us, and has pleaſed to confound your deſigns, and to break your forces, and to bring your perſon into cuſtody, that you might be reſponſible to juſtice.

Sir, we know very well that it is a queſtion much on your ſide preſſed, By what precedent we ſhall proceed? Truly, ſir, for precedents, I ſhall not, upon theſe occaſions, inſtitute any long diſcourſe; but it is no new thing to cite precedents almoſt of all nations, where the people (when power has been in their their hands) have made bold to call their Kings to account; and where the change of government has been upon occaſion of the tyranny and miſgovernment of thoſe who have been placed over them. I will not ſpend time to mention either France, or Spain, or the Empire, or other countries; volumes may be written of it. But truly, ſir, that of the kingdom of Aragon, I ſhall think ſome of us have thought upon it, where they have the Juſtice of Aragon, that is, a man, "tanquam in "medio poſitus," betwixt the King of Spain and the people of the country; that if wrong be done by the King, he who is the King of Aragon, the Juſtice has power to reform the wrong; and he is acknowledged to be the King's ſuperior, and is the grand preſerver of their privileges, and has proſecuted Kings upon their miſcarriages.

Sir, what the Tribunes of Rome were heretofore, and what the Ephori were to the Lacedemonian ſtate, we know that is the parliament of England to the Engliſh ſtate: and tho' Rome ſeemed to loſe its liberty when once the Emperors were; yet you ſhall find ſome famous acts of juſtice even done by the Senate of Rome; that great tyrant of his time, Nero, condemned and judged by the Senate. But truly, ſir, to you I ſhould not need mention theſe foreign examples and ſtories: if you look but over Tweed, we find enough in your native kingdom of Scotland: if we look to your firſt King Fergus, whom your ſtories make mention of, he was an elective King: he died and left two ſons, both in their minority; the kingdom made choice of their uncle, his brother, to govern in the minority. Afterwards, the elder brother giving ſmall hopes to the people that he would rule or govern well, ſeeking to ſupplant that good uncle of his, who governed them juſtly, they ſet the elder aſide and took to the younger. Sir, if I ſhould come to what your ſtories make mention of; you know very well, you are the hundred and ninth King of Scotland: for to mention ſo many Kings as that kingdom, according to their power and privilege, have made bold to deal withal, ſome to baniſh, and ſome to impriſon, and ſome to put to death, it would be too long; and as one of your own authors ſays, it would be too long to recite the manifold examples which your own ſtories make mention of. Reges, &c. (ſay they) we do create; we created Kings at firſt: Leges, &c. we impoſed laws upon them. And as they are choſen by the ſuffrages of the people at firſt; ſo upon juſt occaſion, by the ſame ſuffrages they may be taken down again. And we will be bold to ſay, that no kingdom has yielded more plentiful experience than that your native kingdom of Scotland has done, concerning the depoſition and the puniſhment of their offending and tranſgreſſing Kings, &c.

It is not far to go for an example near you: your grandmother ſet aſide, and your father, an infant, crowned. And the ſtate did it here in England: here has not been a want of ſome examples. They have made bold (the parliament and the people of England) to call their Kings to account: there are frequent examples of it in the Saxons time, the time before the Conqueſt. Since the Conqueſt there want not ſome precedents neither; King Edward the Second, King Richard the Second, were dealed with ſo by the parliament, as they were depoſed and deprived. And truly, ſir, whoever ſhall look into their ſtories, they ſhall not find the articles, which are charged upon them, to come near to that height and capitalneſs of crimes which are laid to your charge; nothing near.

Sir, you were pleaſed to ſay, the other day, wherein they diſſent; and I did not contradict it. But take all together, ſir; if you were, as the charge ſpeaks, and no otherwiſe, admited King of England: but for that you were pleaſed then to allege how that, almoſt for a thouſand years, theſe things have been, ſtories will tell you, if you go no higher than the time of the Conqueſt; if you do come down ſince the Conqueſt, you are the twenty-fourth King from William called the Conqueror, you ſhall find one half of them to come merely from the ſtate, and not merely upon the point of deſcent. It were eaſy to be inſtanced to you; but time muſt not be loſt that way. And truly, ſir, what a grave and learned judge ſaid, in his time, and well known to you, and is ſince printed for poſterity, That altho' there was ſuch a thing as a deſcent many times, yet the Kings of England ever held the greateſt aſſurance of their titles, when it was declared by parliament. And, ſir, your oath, the manner of your coronation, do ſhew plainly, that the Kings of England, altho' it is true, by the law the next perſon in blood is deſigned, yet if there was juſt cauſe to refuſe him, the people of England might do it. For there is a contract and a bargain made between the King and his people, and your oath is taken: and certainly, ſir, the bond is reciprocal; for as you are the liege Lord, ſo they liege ſubjects. And we know very well what has been ſo much ſpoken of, "Ligeantia eſt duplex." This we know now, The one tie, the one bond, is the bond of protection, which is due from the Sovereign; the 'others is the bond of ſubjection, which is due from the ſubject. Sir, if this bond be once broken, farewell ſovereignty; "Subjectio trahit, &c."

Theſe things may not be denied, ſir: I ſpeak it rather and I pray God it may work upon your heart, that you be ſenſible of your miſcarriages. For whether you have been, as by your office you ought to be, a protector of England, or the deſtroyer of England, let all England judge, or all the world, which has looked upon it. Sir, tho' you have it by inheritance, in the way which is ſpoken of, yet it muſt not be denied that your office was an office of truſt, and indeed an office of the higheſt truſt lodged in any ſingle perſon: for as you were the grand adminiſtrator of juſtice, and others were, as your delegates, to ſee it done throughout your realms; if your greateſt office was to do juſtice, and preſerve your people from wrong, and inſtead of doing that, you will be the great wrong-doer yourſelf; if inſtead of being a conſervator of the peace, you will be the grand diſturber of the peace, ſurely this is contrary to your office, contrary to your truſt. Now, ſir, if it be an office of inheritance, as you ſpeak of, your title by deſcent, let all men know, that great offices are ſeizable and forfeitable, as if you had it but for a year, and for your life. Therefore, ſir, it will concern you to take into your ſerious conſideration your great miſcarriages in this kind.

Truly, ſir, I ſhall not particulariſe the many miſcarriages of your reign whatſoever; they are famouſly known: it had been happy for the kingdom, and happy for you too, if it had not been ſo much known, and ſo much felt, as the ſtory of your miſcarriages muſt needs be, and has been already.

Sir, that which we are now upon, by the command of the higheſt court, has been, and is to try and judge you for theſe great offenſes of yours. Sir, the charge has called you "Tyrant, a Traitor, a Murderer, and a public Enemy to the "Common-wealth of England." Sir, it had been well if any of all theſe terms might rightly and juſtly have been ſpared, if any one of them at all.

KING. Ha!

LD PRES. Truly, ſir, we have been told, "Rex eſt "dum bene regit, Tyrannus qui populum opprimit:" and if ſo be that be the definition of a Tyrant, then ſee how you come ſhort of it in your actions, whether the higheſt tyrant, by that way of arbitrary government, and which you have ſought to introduce, and which you have ſought to put, you were puting upon the people? Whether that was not as high an act of tyranny as any of your predeceſſors were guilty of, nay, many degrees beyond it?

Sir, the term Traitor cannot be ſpared. We ſhall eaſily agree it muſt denote and ſuppoſe a breach of truſt; and it muſt ſuppoſe it to be done to a ſuperior. And therefore, ſir, as the people of England might have incurred that reſpecting you, if they had been truly guilty of it, as to the definition of law; ſo, on the other ſide, when you did break your truſt to the kingdom, you did break your truſt to your ſuperior: for the kingdom is that for which you were truſted. And therefore, ſir, for this breach of truſt, when you are called to account, you are called to account by your ſuperiors. "Mi- "nimus ad majorem in judicium vocat." And, ſir, the people of England cannot be ſo far wanting to themſelves, God having dealed ſo miraculouſly and glorioufly for them; but that, having power in their hands, and their great enemy, they muſt proceed to do juſtice to themſelves and to you: for, ſir, the court could heartily deſire, that you would lay your hand upon your heart, and conſider what you have done amiſs, that you would indeavor to make your peace with God. Truly, ſir, theſe are your "High Crimes, Tyranny and Treaſon."

There is a third thing too, if thoſe had not been; and that is Murder, which is laid to your charge. All the bloody murders, which have been commited ſince this time when the diviſion was betwixt you and your people, muſt be laid to your charge, which have been acted or commited in theſe late wars. Sir, it is a heinous and crying ſin: and truly, ſir, if any man will aſk us, what puniſhment is due to a Murderer, let God's law, let man's law ſpeak. Sir, I will preſume, that you are ſo well read in ſcripture, as to know what God himſelf has ſaid concerning the ſheding of man's blood: Gen. 9. Num. 35. will tell you what the puniſhment is: and which this court, in behalf behalf of the whole kingdom, are ſenſible of, of that innocent blood which has been ſhed, whereby indeed the land ſtands ſtill defiled with that blood; and, as the text has it, it can no way be cleanſed but with the ſheding of the blood of him who ſhed this blood. Sir, we know no diſpenſation from this blood in that commandment, "Thou ſhalt do no murder:" we do not know but that it extends to Kings as well as to the meaneſt peaſants, the meaneſt of the people; the command is univerſal. Sir, God's law forbids it; man's law forbids it: nor do we know that there is any manner of exception, not even in man's laws, for the puniſhment of murder in you. It is true that, in the caſe of Kings, every private hand was not to put forth itſelf to this work, for their reformation and puniſhment: but, ſir, the people repreſented, having power in their hands, had there been but one wilful act of murder by you commited, had power to have convened you, and to have puniſhed you for it.

But then, ſir, the weight which lies upon you in all thoſe reſpects which have been ſpoken, by reaſon of your Tyranny, Treaſon, Breach of Truſt, and the Murders which have been commited; ſurely, ſir, it muſt drive you into a ſad conſideration concerning your eternal condition. As I ſaid at firſt, I know it cannot be pleaſing to you to hear any ſuch things as theſe are mentioned unto you from this Court, for ſo we do call ourſelves, and juſtify ourſelves to be a court and a High-court of Juſtice, authoriſed by the higheſt and ſolemneſt court of the kingdom, as we have often ſaid: and altho' you do yet indeavor what you may to diſ-court us, yet we do take knowledge of ourſelves to be ſuch a court as can adminiſter juſtice to you; and we are bound, ſir, in duty to do it. Sir, all I ſhall ſay before the reading of your ſentence, it is but this; the court does heartily deſire, that you will ſeriouſly think of thoſe evils which you ſtand guilty of. Sir, you ſaid well to us the other day, you wiſhed us to have God before our eyes. Truly, ſir, I hope all of us have ſo: that God, who we know is a King of Kings, and Lord of Lords; that God with whom there is no reſpect of perſons; that God, who is the avenger of innocent blood: we have that God before us; that God, who does beſtow a curſe upon them, who with-hold not their hands from ſheding of blood, which is the caſe of guilty malefactors, and who do deſerve death: that God we have before our eyes. And were it not that the conſcience of our duty has called us unto this place, and this imployment, ſir, you ſhould have had no appearance of a court here. But, ſir, we muſt prefer the diſcharge of our duty unto God, and unto the kingdom, before any other reſpect whatſoever. And altho' at this time many of us, if not all of us, are ſeverely threatened by ſome of your party, what they intend to do, ſir, we do here declare, That we ſhall not decline or forbear the doing our duty in the adminiſtration of juſtice, even to you, according to the merit of your offenſe, altho' God ſhould permit thoſe men to effect all that bloody deſign in hand againſt us. Sir, we will ſay, and we will declare it, as thoſe children in the fiery furnace, who would not worſhip the golden image which Nebuchadnezzar had ſet up, "That their God was able to "deliver them from that danger which they were near unto:" but yet if he would not do it, yet notwithſtanding that, they would not fall down and worſhip the image. We ſhall thus apply it: that tho' we ſhould not be delivered from thoſe bloody hands and hearts, who conſpire the overthrow of the kingdom in general, of us in particular, for acting in this great work of juſtice, tho' we ſhould periſh in the work, yet, by God's grace, and by God's ſtrength, we will go on with it. And this is all our reſolutions. Sir, I ſay for yourſelf, we do heartily wiſh and deſire, that God would be pleaſed to give you a ſenſe of your ſins, that you would ſee wherein you have done amiſs, that you may cry unto him, that God would deliver you from blood-guiltineſs. A good King was once guilty of that particular thing, and was clear otherwiſe, ſaving in the matter of Uriah. Truly, ſir, the ſtory tells us that he was a repentant King; and it ſignifies enough, that he had died for it, but that God was pleaſed to accept of him, and to give him his pardon, "Thou ſhalt not die, but the child ſhall die: thou haſt given "cauſe to the enemies of God to blaſpheme."

KING. I would deſire only one word before you give ſentence; and that is, That you would hear me concerning thoſe great imputations, which you have laid to my charge.

LD PRES. Sir. you muſt give me now leave to go on; for I am not far from your ſentence, and your time is now paſſed.

KING. But I ſhall deſire you will hear me a few words to you: for truly, whatever ſentence you will put upon me in reſpect of thoſe heavy imputations, that I ſee by your ſpeech you have put upon me; ſir, it is very true, that——

LD PRES. Sir, I muſt put you in mind: truly, ſir, I would not willingly, at this time eſpecially, interrupt you in any thing you have to ſay, which is proper for us to admit of; but, ſir, you have not owned us as a court, and you look upon us as a ſort of people met together; and we know what language we receive from your party.

KING. I know nothing of that.

LD PRES. You diſavow us as a court; and therefore for you to addreſs yourſelf to us, not acknowledging us as a court to judge of what you ſay, it is not to be permited. And the truth is, all along, from the firſt time you were pleaſed to diſavow and diſown us, the court needed not to have heard you one word: for unleſs they be acknowledged a court, and ingaged, it is not proper for you to ſpeak. Sir, we have given you too much liberty already, and admited of too much delay, and we may not admit of any farther. Were it proper for us to do it, we ſhould hear you freely, and we ſhould not have declined to hear you at large, what you could have ſaid or proved on your behalf, whether for totally excuſing, or for in part excuſing thoſe great and heinous charges, which in whole or in part are laid upon you. But, ſir, I ſhall trouble you no longer; your ſins are of ſo large a dimenſion, that if you do but ſeriouſly think of them, they will drive you to a ſad conſideration of it, and they may improve in you a ſad and ſerious repentance: and that the court does heartily wiſh, that you may be ſo penitent for what you have done amiſs, that God may have mercy, at leaſtwiſe, upon your better part: truly, ſir, for the other, it is our parts and duties to do that which the law preſcribes. We are not here 'jus dare,' but 'jus dicere.' We cannot be unmindful of what the ſcripture tells us, "For to acquit the guilty is of equal abomination, as "to condemn the innocent:" we may not acquit the guilty. What ſentence the law affirms to a Traitor, Tyrant, a Murderer, and a public Enemy to the country, that ſentence you are now to hear read unto you; and that is the ſentence of the court.

The Lord Preſident commands the Sentence to be read; make an O Yes, and command ſilence while the ſentence is read.

O Yes made: ſilence commanded.

The clerk read the ſentence, which was drawn up in parchment: viz.

"WHEREAS the Commons of England in Parlia"ment had appointed them a High-court of Juſtice,
"for the trying of Charles Stuart, King of England, before "whom he had been three times convened; and at the firſt
"time a Charge of High-treaſon, and other Crimes and Miſ-
"demeanors, was read in the behalf of the Kingdom of Eng"land, &c.

Here the clerk read the charge.

"Which charge being read unto him, as aforeſaid, he the "ſaid Charles Stuart was required to give his anſwer: but he "refuſed ſo to do;"—— and ſo expreſſed the ſeveral paſſages at his trial in refuſing to anſwer.

"For all which treaſons and crimes this Court doth adjudge,
"That the ſaid Charles Stuart, as a Tyrant, Traitor, Mur-"derer, and a public Enemy, ſhall be put to death, by the "ſevering his head from his body."

After the Sentence read, the lord preſident ſaid,

This Sentence now read and publiſhed, is the Act, Sentence, Judgment, and Reſolution of the whole Court.

Here the court ſtood up, as aſſenting to what the preſident ſaid.

KING. Will you hear me a word, ſir?

LD PRES. Sir, you are not to be heard after the ſentence.

KING. No, Sir?

LD PRES. No, Sir; by your favor, Sir. Guard, withdraw your priſoner.

KING. I may ſpeak after ſentence ———

By your favor, Sir, I may ſpeak after the ſentence ever.

By your favor, (hold!) the ſentence, ſir——

I ſay, ſir, I do———

I am not ſuffered for to ſpeak: expect what juſtice other people will have.

O Yes. All manner of perſons, who have any thing elſe to do, do, are to depart at this time, and to give their attendance in the Painted-chamber; to which place this court doth forthwith adjourn itſelf.

Then the court roſe, and the King went with his guard to ſir Robert Cotton's, and from thence to Whitehall.

The Speech COOK deſign'd to have delivered, if the King had pleaded.

May it pleaſe your lordſhip,

MY lord preſident, and this High-court, erected for the moſt comprehenſive, impartial, and glorious piece of juſtice, which ever was acted and executed upon the theater of England, for the trying and judging of Charles Stuart, whom God in his wrath gave to be a King to this nation, and will, I truſt, in great love, for his notorious prevarications and blood-guiltineſs, take him away from us: he who hath been the original of all injuſtice, and the principal author of more miſchiefs to the free-born people of this nation, than the beſt arithmetician can well enumerate, ſtands now to give an account of his ſtewardſhip, and to receive the good of juſtice, for all the evil of his injuſtice and cruelty. Had he ten thouſand lives, they could not all ſatisfy for the numerous, horrid, and barbarous maſſacres of myriads and legions of innocent perſons, which by his commands, commiſſions, and procurements (or at leaſt all the world muſt needs ſay, which he might have prevented; and he who ſuffers any man to be kill'd, when he may ſave his life without danger of his own, is a murderer) have been cruelly ſlain, and inhumanly murdered, in this renowned Albion: Anglia hath been made an Akeldama, and her younger ſiſter Ireland a land of ire and miſery. And yet this hard-hearted man, as he went out of the court down the ſtairs, Jan. 22, ſaid (as ſome of his guard told me and others) That he was not troubled for any of the blood which has been ſhed, but for the blood of one man (peradventure he meaned Strafford.) He was no more affected with a liſt which was brought into Oxford of five or ſix thouſand ſlain at Edgehill, than to read one of Ben. Johnſon's tragedies. You gentlemen Royaliſts who fought for him, if ye had loſt your lives for his ſake, you ſee he would have no more pitied you by his own confeſſion, than you do a poor worm: and yet what heart but would cleave, if it were a rock; melt if it were ice; break if it were a flint; or diſſolve if it were a diamond, to conſider that ſo much precious Proteſtant blood ſhould be ſhed in theſe three kingdoms; ſo many gallant valiant men of all ſorts and conditions to be ſacrificed and loſe their lives, and many of them to die ſo deſperately in regard of their eternal conditions; and all this merely, and only for the ſatisfying and fulfilling of one man's ſinful luſt and wicked will? A good ſhepherd is he who lays down his life, or ventures it to ſave the ſheep; but for one to be ſo proudly wedded to his own conceits, as ſo maliciouſly to oppoſe his private opinion againſt the public judgment and reaſon of ſtate, and to make head againſt the parliament, who acknowledged him to be head thereof, ſo far as to give him the honor of the royal aſſent, in ſetling the militia and ſafety of the people: I ſay, for a Proteſtant Prince, ſo beloved at home, and feared abroad, who in love, and by gentle means might have had any thing from the parliament, for him to occaſion the ſhedding of ſo much blood for a pretended prerogative, as hereafter will appear, nothing in effect but to fix and perpetuate an abſolute tyranny; I can ſay no leſs, "But, O Lucifer, from whence art thou fallen?" And what heretics are they in politics, who would have had ſuch a man to live? Much more, that think his actions to have merited love and praiſe from heaven and earth. But now to diſſect the charge.

I. That the Kings of England are truſted with a limited power to govern by law, the whole ſtream and current of legal authorities run ſo limpid and clear, that I ſhould but weary thoſe who know it already, and trouble thoſe who need not know the particular caſes; for it is one of the fundamentals of law, that the King is not above the law, but the law above the King. I could eaſily deraign it from 1 Edw. 3. to the juriſdiction of courts, That the King has no more power or authority, than what by law is concredited and commited to him: but the moſt famous authority is Forteſcue, chancellor to Henry VI (and therefore undoubtedly would not clip his maſter's prerogative) who moſt judiciouſly takes a difference between a government wholly regal and ſeignoral, as in Turkey, Ruſſia, France, Spain, &c. and a goverment politic and mixed; where the laws keeps the beam even between ſovereignty and ſubjection, as in England, Denmark, Sweden, and Poland. The firſt, where the edict of a Prince makes the law, reſembles an impetuous inundation of the waters, whereby the corn and hay, and other fruits of the earth are ſpoiled, as when it is midwinter at midſummer; the latter is like a ſweet ſmooth ſtream, running by the pleaſant fields and meadows. That by the law of England the King ought not to impoſe any thing upon the people, or take any thing away from them to the value of a farthing, but by common conſent in parliaments or national meetings; and that the people of common right, and by ſeveral ſtatutes ought to have parliaments yearly, or oftner if need be, for the redreſs of public grievances, and for the enacting of good and wholeſome laws, and repealing of old ſtatutes of Omeri which are prejudicial to the nation: and that the King hath not by law ſo much power as a juſtice of peace, to commit any man to priſon for any offenſe whatſoever, becauſe all ſuch matters were commited to proper courts and officers of juſtice: and if the King by his verbal command ſend for any perſon to come before him, if the party refuſe to attend, and the meſſenger indeavoring to force him they fell to blows; if the meſſenger killed the party ſent for, this by the law is murder in him, but if he killed the meſſenger, this was juſtifiable in him, being in his own defenſe, ſo as to ſue forth a pardon of courſe: theſe and many other caſes of like nature are ſo clear and well known, that I will not preſume to multiply particulars.

That the King took an oath at his coronation to preſerve the peace of the nation, to do juſtice to all, and to keep and obſerve the laws which the people have, himſelf confeſſes: and it was charged upon the late archbiſhop, that he emaſculated the oath, and left out very material words, "Which the people ſhall chuſe:" which certainly he durſt not have done, without the King's ſpecial command. And it ſeems to me no light preſumption, that from that very day he had a deſign to alter and ſubvert the fundamental laws, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government. But tho' there had been no oath, yet by ſpecial office and duty of his place, every King of England is obliged to act for the peoples good: for all power, as it is originally in the people (he muſt needs be extreme ignorant, malicious, or a ſelf-deſtroyer, who ſhall deny it) ſo it is given forth for their preſervation, nothing for their deſtruction. For a King to rule by luſt, and not by law, is a creature which was never of God's making, not of God's approbation, but his permiſſion: and tho' ſuch men are ſaid to be gods on earth, it is in no other ſenſe than the devil is called the god of this world. It ſeems that one paſſage which the King would have offered to the court (but it was not permited him to diſpute the ſupreme authority in the nation; and ſtanding mute, the charge being for high-treaſon, it is a conviction in law) was, 1 Sam. viii. is a copy of the King's commiſſion, by virtue whereof, he, as King, might rule and govern as he "liſt; "That he might take the peoples ſons, and appoint "them for himſelf, for his chariots, and to be his horſemen, "and take their daughters to be his confectioners, and take "their fields, and vine-yards, and olive-yards, even the beſt "of them, and the goodlieſt young-men, and their aſſes, "and give them to his officers, and to his ſervants," which indeed is a copy and pattern of an abſolute tyrant and abſolute ſlaves, where the people have no more than the tyrant will afford them. The holy ſpirit in that chapter does not inſinuate what a good King ought to do, but what a wicked King would preſume to do. Beſide, Saul and David had extraordinary callings, but all juſt power is now derived from and confered by the people: yet, in the caſe of Saul, it is obſervable, that the people, out of pride to be like other nations, deſired a King, and ſuch a King as the heathens had, who were all tyrants: for they who know any thing in hiſtory, know that the firſt four Monarchs were all tyrants originally, 'till they gained the peoples conſent. Nimrod, the great hunter, was Ninus who builded Nineveh, the firſt tyrant and conqueror who had no title; and ſo were all kingdoms, which are not elective, 'till the peoples ſubſequent conſent: and tho' it be by deſcent, yet it is a continuation of a conqueſt: until the people conſent, and voluntarily ſubmit to a government, they are but ſlaves, and in reaſon they may free themſelves if they can. In France, the King begins his reign from the day of his coronation: the archbiſhop aſks the people, if he ſhall be King; the twelve peers, or ſome who perſonate them, ſay, Yes.

1ſt Book of Ord. fol.

Yes. They girt the ſword about him: then he ſwears to defend the laws. And is any thing more natural than to keep an oath? And tho' virtuous Kings have prevailed with the people to make their crowns hereditary, yet the coronation ſhews the ſhell the kernel hath been in. Samuel was a good judge, and there was nothing could be objected againſt him; therefore God was diſpleaſed at their inordinate deſire of a King; and it ſeems to me, that the Lord declares his diſlike of all ſuch Kings as the heathens were: that is, Kings with an unlimited power; who are not tied to laws; for he gave them a King in his wrath, therein dealing with them as the wiſe phyſician with the diſtempered and impatient patient, who deſiring to drink wine, tells him the danger of inflammation; yet wine he will have, and the phyſician, conſidering a little wine will do but little hurt, rather than his patient, by freting ſhould take greater hurt, preſcribes a little white-wine: wherein the phyſician doth not approve his drinking of wine; but of two evils chuſes the leaſt. The Jews would have a King for majeſty and ſplendor, like the heathens; God permits this, he approves it not: it ſeems to me, that the Lord renounces the very 'Genus' of ſuch Kings as are there mentioned, and the old word 'Coning' (by contraction King) does not ſignify power or force to do what he will, but a knowing, wiſe, diſcrete man, who opens the peoples eyes, and does not lead them by the noſes, but governs them with wiſdom and diſcretion for their own good. Therefore, gentlemen-Royaliſts, be not ſo mad as to miſconſtrue either the oaths of allegiance or ſupremacy, or any league or covenant, that any man ſhould ſwear to give any one leave to cut his throat: the true meaning is, that the King of England was ſupreme in this land, in oppoſition to the Pope, or any other Prince or Potentate, as the words of the oath do import, "That no foreign "State, Prince, or Potentate, &c." In caſe of any foreign invaſion, the King was, by law, to be generaliſſimo, to command the people for their own ſafety; and ſo it was expounded by the parliament, in 13 Eliz. which, for ſome reaſon of ſtate, was not permited to be printed with the ſtatutes. Beſide, God told thoſe Kings, whom he had formerly anointed, what their duty was; not to exalt themſelves overmuch above their brethren, but to delight themſelves in the law of God. Out of which I infer, that the Turks, Tartars, Muſcovites, French, Spaniards, and all people who live at the beck and nod of tyrannical men, may and ought to free themſelves from that tyranny, if, and when, they can; for ſuch tyrants who ſo domineer with a rod of iron, do not govern by God's permiſſive hand of approbation or benediction, but by the permiſſive hand of his providence, ſuffering them to ſcourge the people, for ends beſt known to himſelf, until he open a way for the people to work out their own infranchiſements.

But before I ſpeak of the war, it will be neceſſary, for the ſatisfaction of rational men, to open and prove the King's wicked deſign, wherewith he ſtands charged. Now that he had from the begining of his reign ſuch a deſign and indeavor ſo to tear up the foundations of government, that law ſhould be no protection to any man's perſon or eſtate, will clearly appear by what follows:

1. By his not taking the oath ſo fully as his predeceſſors did, that ſo when the parliament ſhould tender good laws to him for the royal aſſent, he might readily anſwer, that he was not, by oath, obliged to confirm or corroborate the ſame.

2. By his diſhonorable and perfidious dealing with the people at his coronation, when he ſet forth a proclamation, That, in regard of the infection then ſpread thro' the kingdom, he promiſed to diſpenſe with thoſe knights, who, by an old ſtatute, were to attend at the coronation, who were thereby required not to attend; but did notwithſtanding within a few months after take advantage of their abſenſe, and raiſed a vaſt ſum of money out of their eſtates at the Council-table: where they, pleading the ſaid proclamation for their juſtification, were anſwered, That the law of the land was above any proclamation: like that tyrant, who, when he could not, by law, execute a virgin, commanded her to be deflowered, and then put to death.

3. By his altering the patents and commiſſions to the judges, which having heretofore had their places granted to them for "ſo long as they ſhould behave themſelves well therein;" he made them but, "during pleaſure;" that if ſo the judges ſhould not declare the law to be as he would have it, he might with a wet finger remove them, and put in ſuch as ſhould not only ſay, but ſwear, if need were, "That the "law was as the King would have it." For when a man ſhall give five or ten thouſand pounds for a judge's place, during the King's pleaſure, and he ſhall, the next day, ſend to him, to know his opinion of a difference in law between the King and ſubject; and it ſhall be intimated to him, "That, if he "do not deliver his opinion for the King, he is likely to be re-"moved out of his place the next day:" which, if ſo, he knows not how to live, but muſt rot in a priſon for the money which he borrowed to buy his place; as was well known to be ſome of their caſes, who under-hand and cloſely bought great places to elude the danger of the ſtatute. Whether this was not too heavy a temptation for the ſhoulders of moſt men to bear, is no hard matter to determine. So as upon the matter, that very act of his made the King at leaſt a potential tyrant; for when that ſhall be law which a King ſhall declare himſelf, or which ſhall be declared by thoſe whom he chuſes, this brings the people to the very next ſtep to ſlavery.

But that which does irrefragably prove the deſign, was his reſtleſs deſire to deſtroy parliaments, or to make them uſeleſs: and for that, who knows not but that there were three or four national meetings in parliament in the firſt four years of his reign, which were called for ſupply, to bring money into his coffers, in point of ſubſidies, rather than for any benefit to the people; as may appear by the few good laws which were then made? But that which is moſt memorable, is the untimely diſſolving of the parliament in 4 Car. when ſir John Elliot (and others who managed a conference with the houſe of peers concerning the duke of Buckingham, who among other things, was charged concerning the death of King James) were commited cloſe priſoners to the Tower, where he loſt his life by cruel indurance; which I may not paſs over without a ſpecial animadverſion: for ſure, there is no Turk or Heathen but will ſay, that if he was any way guilty of his father's death, let him die for it.

I would not willingly be ſo injurious to the honeſt reader, as to make him buy that again which he hath formerly met with in the parliament's declaration, or elſewhere; in ſuch a caſe a marginal reference may be ſufficient. Nor would I herein be ſo preſumptuous, as to prevent any thing which haply may be intended in any declaration for more general ſatisfaction; but humbly to offer a ſtudent's mite, which ſatisfies myſelf, with ſubmiſſion to better judgments.

How the King firſt came to the crown, God and his own conſcience beſt knew. It was well known and obſerved at court that, a little before, he was a profeſſed enemy to the duke of Buckingham; but inſtantly, upon the death of King James, took him into ſuch ſpecial protection, grace and favor, that upon the matter he divided the kingdom with him. And when the earl of Briſtol had exhibited a charge againſt the ſaid duke, the 13th article whereof concerned the death of King James, he inſtantly diſſolved that parliament, that ſo he might protect the duke from the juſtice thereof, and would never ſuffer any legal inquiry to be made for his father's death. The rabbins obſerve, that what ſtuck moſt with Abraham about God's command to ſacrifice Iſaac, was this; "Can I not be "obedient, unleſs I be unnatural? What will the Heathens "ſay, when they hear I have killed my only ſon?" What will an Indian ſay to this caſe? A King has all power in his hand to do juſtice. There is one accuſed, upon ſtrong preſumptions at leaſt, for poiſoning that King's father; the King protects him from juſtice: whether do you believe that himſelf had any hand in his father's death? Had the duke been accuſed for the death of a beggar, he ought not to have protected him from a judicial trial. We know that, by law, it is no leſs than miſpriſion of treaſon to conceal a treaſon; and to conceal a murder, ſtrongly implies a guilt thereof, and makes him a kind of acceſſary to the fact. He who hath no nature to do juſtice to his own father, could it ever be expected that he ſhould do juſtice to others? Was he fit to continue a father to the people, who was without natural affection to his own father? Will he love a kingdom, who ſhewed no love to himſelf, unleſs it was, that he durſt not ſuffer inquiſition to be made for it? But I leave it as a riddle which, at the day of judgment, will be expounded and unriddled; for ſome ſins will not be made maniteſt 'till that day, with this only, That had he made the law of God his delight, and ſtudied therein night and day, as God commanded his Kings to do; or had he but ſtudied ſcripture half ſo much as Ben. Johnſon or Shakeſpear, he might have have learned, That when Amaziah was ſetled in the kingdom, he ſuddenly did juſtice upon thoſe ſervants who had killed his father Joaſh: he did not, by any pretended prerogative, excuſe or protect them, but delivered them up into the hands of that juſtice which the horridneſs of the fact did undoubtedly demerit.

2 Kings 12. 20. and 14. 1, 5.

That parliament (4 Car.) proving ſo abortive, the King ſets forth a proclamation; that none ſhould preſume to move him to call parliaments, for he knew how to raiſe monies enough without the help of parliaments: therefore in twelve years refuſes to call any. In which interval and intermiſſion, how he had oppreſſed the people, by incroachments and uſurpations upon their liberties and properties; and what vaſt ſums of money he had forcibly exacted and exhauſted, by illegal patents and monopolies of all ſorts, I refer the reader to that moſt judicious and full "Declaration of the ſtate of the kingdom," publiſhed in the begining of this parliament. That judgment of ſhip-money did, upon the matter, formaliſe the people abſolute ſlaves, and him an abſolute tyrant: for if the King may take from the people, in caſe of neceſſity, and himſelf ſhall be judge of that neceſſity, then cannot any man ſay that he is worth ſix pence: for if the King ſays, that he hath need of that ſix pence, then by law he muſt have it. I mean that great Nimrod, who would have made all England a foreſt; and the people whom the biſhop calls his ſheep, to be his veniſon to be hunted at his pleaſure.

27. Mar. 5 Car.

Nor does the common objection, "That the judges and "evil counſellors, and not the King, ought to be reſponſible "for ſuch male-adminiſtration, injuſtice and oppreſſion," bear the weight of a feather in the balance of right reaſon. For, firſt: Who made ſuch wicked and corrupt judges? Were they not his own creatures? And ought not every man to be accountable for the works of his own hands? He who does not hinder the doing of evil, if it lies in his power to prevent it, is guilty of it, as a commander thereof. He who ſuffered thoſe black ſtars to inflict ſuch barbarous cruelties, and unheard-of puniſhments, as brandings, ſliting of noſes, &c. upon honeſt men, to the diſhonor of the Proteſtant religion, and diſgrace of the image of God ſhining in the face of man, he well deſerved to have been ſo ſerved. But ſecondly, He had the benefit of thoſe illegal fines and judgments. I agree, that if a judge ſhall oppreſs I. S. for the benefit of I. D. the King ought not to anſwer for this, but the judge, unleſs he protect the judge againſt the complaint of I. S. and in that caſe he makes himſelf guilty of it. But when unjuſt judgment is given againſt I. S. for the King's benefit, and the fine to come immediately into his coffers; he who receives the money muſt needs be preſumed to conſent to the judgment. But, thirdly: Mark a Machiavel-policy; "Call no parliaments to queſtion the in-"juſtice and corruption of judges for the peoples relief; and "make your own judges, and let that be law which they "declare; whether it be reaſonable or unreaſonable it is no "matter."

But then, how came it to paſs that we had any more parliaments? Had we not a gracious King to call a parliament when there was ſo much need of it, and to paſs ſo many gracious acts to put down the Star-chamber, &c.? Nothing leſs; it was not any voluntary free act of grace, not the leaſt ingredient or tincture of love or good affection to the people, which called the ſhort parliament in 1640; but to ſerve his own turn againſt the Scots, whom he then had deſigned to inſlave; and thoſe ſeven acts of grace, which the King paſſed, were no more than his duty to do, nor half ſo much; but giving the people a taſte of their own griſts; and he diſſents with them about the militia, which commanded all the reſt: he never intended thereby any more good and ſecurity to the people, than he who, ſtealing the gooſe, leaves the feathers behind him. But to anſwer the queſtion; thus it was.

The King, being wholly given up to be led by the counſels of a jeſuited party, who indeavored to throw a bone of diſſention among us, that they might caſt their net into our troubled waters, and catch more fiſh: for St. Peter's ſee perſuaded the King to ſet up a new form of prayer in Scotland, and laid the bait ſo cunningly, that whether they ſaw it or not, they were undone. If they ſaw the myſtery of iniquity couched in it, they would reſiſt, and ſo merit puniſhment for rebelling; if they ſwallowed it, it would make way for worſe. Well; they ſaw the poiſon, and refuſed to taſte it. The King makes war, and many who loved honor and wealth more, than God, aſſiſted him: down he went with an army; but his treaſure waſted in a ſhort time: fight they would not, for fear of an after-reckoning. Some commanders propound, that they ſhould make their demands; and the King grants all, comes back to London, and burns the pacification, ſaying it was counterfeit. They re-aſſume their forces; he raiſes a ſecond war againſt them, and was neceſſitated to call a parliament, offering to lay down ſhip-money for twelve ſubſidies. They refuſe; the King in high diſpleaſure breaks off the parliament, and in a declaration commands them, not to think of any more parliaments, for he would never call another.

There was a King of Egypt who cruelly oppreſſed the people. They, poor ſlaves, complaining to one another, he feared a riſing, and commanded, that none ſhould complain upon pain of cruel death. Spies being abroad, they often met, yet durſt not ſpeak, but parted with tears in their eyes; which declared, that they had more to utter, but durſt not. This ſtruck him to greater fears: he commanded, that none ſhould look upon one another's eyes at parting; therefore their griefs being too great to be ſmothered, they fetched a deep ſigh when they parted, which moved them ſo much to compaſſionate one another's wrongs, that they ran in and killed the tyrant. The long-hatching Iriſh treaſon was now ripe, and therefore it was neceſſary that England and Scotland ſhould be in combuſtion, leſt we might help the Iriſh Proteſtants. Well; the Scots get Newcaſtle; he knew they would truſt him no more, he had ſo often broke with them, therefore no hopes to get them out by a treaty. Many lords and the city petition for a parliament; the King was at ſuch a neceſſity, that yield he muſt to that which he moſt abhorred; God had brought him to ſuch a ſtrait, that he who, a few months before, aſſumed the power of God, commanding men not to think of parliaments, to reſtrain the free thoughts of the heart of man, was conſtrained to call one, which they knew he would break off when the Scots were ſent home, and therefore got a confirmation of it, that he ſhould not diſſolve it without the conſent of both houſes, of which he had no hopes, or by force, which he ſuddenly attempted; and the Engliſh army, in the north, was to have come up to confound the parliament, and this rebellious and diſloyal city, as the King called it; and for their pains were promiſed thirty thouſand pounds and the plunder, as by the examinations of colonel Goring, Legg, &c. doth moſt fully appear.

And here, by the way, I cannot but commend the city-malignants: he calls them rebels, they call him a gracious King: he, by his proclamation at Oxford, prohibits all commerce and intercourſe of trade between this populous city (the life and intereſt whereof conſiſts in trade, without which many thouſands cannot ſubſiſt) and other parts of the kingdom: ſtill they do good againſt evil; and, petitioning him ſo often to cut their throats, are troubled at nothing ſo much as that they are not reduced to that former and a worſe bondage than when there was a lord-warden made in the city, and the King ſent for as much of their eſtates as he pleaſed. But ſurely, the Oxfordſhire men are more to be commended; for when the King had commanded, by his proclamation, That what corn, hay, and other proviſion in the county of Oxford, could not be fetched into the ſaid city for his gariſon, ſhould be conſumed and deſtroyed by fire, for fear it ſhould fall into the hands of the parliament's friends (a cruelty not to be paralleled by any infidel, heathen, or pagan King; nor to be precedented among the moſt avowed and profeſſed enemies, much leſs from a King to his ſubjects) they reſolved never to truſt him more.

15 April. 20 Car.

But the great queſtion will be; What hath been the true ground and occaſion of the war? Which, unleſs I clear and put it out of queſtion, as the charge imports, I ſhall fall ſhort of what I chiefly aim at, viz. "That the King ſet up his "Standard of war, for the advancement and upholding of his "perſonal intereſt, power and pretended prerogative, againſt "the publick intereſt of common right, peace and ſafety:" and thus I prove it.

1. He fought for the militia by ſea and land, to have it at his abſolute diſpoſe, and to juſtify and maintain his illegal commiſſions of array; and this he pretended was his birthright, by the law of England: which if it were ſo, then might he, by the ſame reaſon, command all the money in the kingdom; for he who carries the ſword, will command the purſe.

2. The next thing which he pretended to fight for, was his power power to call parliaments when he pleaſed, and diſſolve them when he liſt: if they will ſerve his turn, then they may ſit by a law to inſlave the people; ſo that the people had better chuſe all the courtiers and King's favorites at firſt, than to trouble themſelves with ludibrious elections, to aſſemble the freeholders together, to their great labor and expenſe both of time and coin; and thoſe who are choſen knights and burgeſſes, to make great preparations, to take long journies to London, themſelves and their attendants, to ſee the King and lords in their parliament-robes ride in ſtate to the houſe, and, with Domitian, to catch flies: and, no ſooner ſhall there be any breathings, or a ſpirit of juſtice ſtiring and diſcovered in the houſe of commons, but the King ſends the black-rod, and diſſolves the parliament, and ſends them back again as wiſe as they were before, but not with ſo much money in their purſes, to tell ſtories to the freeholders of the bravery of the King and lords.

3. Well; but if this be too groſs, and that the people begin to murmur and clamor for another parliament, then there goes out another ſummons, and they meet, and ſit for ſome time; but to as much purpoſe as before: for, when the commons have preſented any bill for redreſs of a public grievance, then the King has ſeveral games to play, to make all fruitleſs: as, firſt, his own negative voice, that if lords and commons are both agreed, then he will adviſe; which (I know not by what ſtrange doctrine) has been of late conſtrued to be a plain denial; tho', under favor, at the firſt it was no more but to allow him two or three days time to conſider of the equity of the law; in which time if he could not convince them of the injuſtce of it, then ought he, by his oath and by law, to conſent to it.

4. But if, by this means, the King had contracted hard thoughts from the people, and that, not only the commons, but many of the lords, who, have the ſame noble blood runing in their veins, as thoſe Engliſh barons whoſe ſwords were the chief inſtruments which purchaſed Magna Charta; then, that the King might be ſure to put ſome others between him and the peoples hatred, the next prerogative he pretended to have, was, to be the ſole judge of chivalry; to have the ſole power of confering honors; to make as many lords as he pleaſed, that ſo he might be ſure to have two againſt one, if the houſe of commons (by reaſon of the multitude of burgeſſes, which he likewiſe pretended a power to make as many borough-towns and corporations as he pleaſed) were not packed alſo. And this is that glorious privilege of the Engliſh parliaments, ſo much admired for——juſt nothing. For if this pretended prerogative might ſtand for law, as was challenged by his adherents, never was there a nicer cheat put upon any people, nor a more ready way to inſlave them, than by privilege of parliament: being juſt ſuch a mockery of the people, as was that mock-parliament at Oxford, were the King's conſent muſt be the figure, and the repreſentative ſtand for a cypher.

5. But then, out of parliament, the people are made to believe, that the King has commited all juſtice to the judges, and diſtributed the execution thereof into ſeveral courts; and that the King cannot ſo much as impriſon a man, or impoſe any thing upon, nor take any thing away from the people, as by law he ought not to do. But now ſee what prerogative he challenges.

1. If the King has a mind to have any public-ſpirited man removed out of the way, this man is killed, the murderer known, a letter comes to the judge, and, it may be, it ſhall be found but manſlaughter; if it be found murder, the man is condemned, but the King grants him a pardon, which the judge will allow, if the word "Murder" be in it: but becauſe it is too groſs to pardon murder, therefore the King ſhall grant him a leaſe of his life for ſeven years, and then renew it (like a biſhop's leaſe) as he did to major Pritchard, who was lately juſticed; who, being a ſervant to the earl of Lindſey, murdered a gentleman in Lincolnſhire, and was condemned, and had a leaſe of his life from the King, as his own friends have credible told me.

2. For matter of liberty. The King, or any courtier, ſends a man to priſon: if the judge ſets him at liberty, then put him out of his place; a temptation too heavy, for thoſe who love money and honor more than God, to bear: therefore any judgment which is given between the King and a ſubject, is not worth a ruſh; for what will not money do?

Next, he challenges a prerogative to inhance and debaſe monies, which by law was allowed him, ſo far as to balance trade, and no farther; that if gold went high beyond ſea, it might not be cheap here, to have it all bought up and tranſported: but under color of that, he challenges a prerogative, That the King may, by proclamation, make leather current, or make a ſix-pence go for twenty ſhillings, or twenty ſhillings for a ſix-pence. Which, not to mention any thing of the project of farthings, or braſs money, he who challenges ſuch a prerogative, is a potential tyrant: for if he may make my twelve-pence in my pocket worth but two-pence, what property has any man in any thing that he injoys?

Another prerogative pretended was, That the King may avoid any grant; and ſo may cozen and cheat any man by a law. The ground whereof is, That the King's grants ſhall be taken according to his intention; which, in a ſober ſenſe, I wiſh that all mens grants might be ſo conſtrued according to their intention expreſſed by word or writing. But, by this means, it being hard to know what the King intended, his grants have been like the devil's oracles, taken in any contrary ſenſe, for his own advantage.

1. REP. In the famous caſe of Altonwood, there is vouched lord Lovel's caſe: that the King granted lands to lord Lovel, and his heirs males; not for ſervice done, but for a valuable conſideration of money paid. The patentee well hoped to have injoyed the land, not only during his life, but that his heirs males, at leaſt of his body, ſhould have likewiſe injoyed it: but the judges finding it ſeems, that the King was willing to keep the money, and have his land again (for what other reaſon, no mortal man can fathom) reſolved, that it was a void grant, and that nothing paſſed to the patentee. I might inſtance many caſes of like nature, throughout all the reports. As one once made his boaſt, That he never made or paſſed any patent, or charter, from the crown, but he reſerved one ſtarting hole or other, and knew how to avoid it; and ſo merely to cozen and defraud the poor patentee. So that now, put all theſe prerogatives together, 1. The militia by ſea and land. 2. A liberty to call parliaments when he pleaſed; and to adjourn, prorogue, or diſſolve them at pleaſure. 3. A negative voice, that the people cannot ſave themſelves without him, and muſt cut their own throats, if commanded ſo to do. 4. The nomination and making of all the judges, who, upon peril of the loſs of their places, muſt declare the law to be as he pleaſes. 5. A power to confer honors upon whom, and how he pleaſes; a covetous baſe wretch, for five or ten thouſand pounds, to be courted, who deſerves to be carted. 6. To pardon murderers, whom the Lord ſays, ſhall not be pardoned. 7. To ſet a value and price of monies as he pleaſes; that if he be to pay ten thouſand pounds, he may make leather by his proclamation to be current that day, or five ſhillings to paſs for twenty ſhillings; and, if to receive ſo much twenty ſhillings to paſs for five ſhillings: and laſtly, a legal theft to avoid his own grants. I may boldly throw the gantlet, and challenge all the Machiavels in the world, to invent ſuch an exquiſite platform of tyrannical domination, and ſuch a perfect tyranny, without maim or blemiſh, as this is, and that by a law, which is worſt of all. But, the truth is, theſe are no legal prerogatives, but uſurpations, incroachments and invaſions upon the peoples rights and liberties: and this is eaſily effected, without any great depth of policy; for it is but being ſure to call no parliaments, or make them uſeleſs, and make the judges places profitable, and fix avarice upon the bench, and no doubt but the law ſhall ſound as the King would have it. But let me thus far ſatisfy the ingenuous reader, That all the judges in England cannot make one caſe to be law which is not reaſon, no more than they can prove a hair to be white which is black; which if they ſhould ſo declare or adjudge, it is a mere nullity: for law muſt be reaſon adjudged, where reaſon is the 'Genus;' and the judgment in ſome court makes the 'Differentiæ.' And I never found that the fair hand of the common law of England ever reached out any prerogative to the King above the meaneſt man, but in three caſes; 1. In matters of honor and pre-eminence to his perſon; and in matters of intereſt: that he ſhould have mines royal of gold and ſilver, in whoſe land ſoever they were diſcovered; and fiſhes-royal, as ſturgeons and whales, in whoſe ſtreams or water ſoever they were taken, which very rarely happened; or to have Tithes out of a pariſh which no body elſe could challenge: for ſays the law, "The moſt noble perſons "are to have the moſt noble things." 2. To have his patents freed from deceit, that he be not over-reached or cozened in his contracts, being imployed about the great and arduous affairs of the kingdom. 3. His rights to be freed from incurſion of time, not to be bound up by any ſtatute of non-claim: for indeed poſſeſſion is a vain plea, when the matter of right is in queſtion; ſtion; for right can never die: and ſome ſuch honorable privileges of mending his plea, or ſuing in what court he will; and ſome ſuch prerogatives, of a middle, indifferent nature, which could not be prejudicial to the people. But that the law of England ſhould give the King any ſuch vaſt, immenſe, precipitating power, or any ſuch God-like ſtate, That he ought not to be accountable for wicked actions, or male-adminiſtrations and miſgovernment, as he has challenged and averred in his anſwer to the "Petition of Right," or any ſuch principles of tyranny; which are as inconſiſtent with the peoples liberties and ſafety as the Ark and Dagon, light and darkneſs, in an intenſive degree, is a moſt vain and irrational thing to imagine. And yet that was the ground of our war, as himſelf often declared; and that would not have half-contented him, if he had come in by the ſword. But ſome rational men object, How can it be murder (ſay they) for the King to raiſe forces againſt the parliament, ſince there is no other way of determining differences between the King and his ſubjects, but by the ſword? for the law is no competent judge between two ſupreme powers; and then if it be only a contending for each other's right, where is the malice which makes the killing of a man murder? Take the anſwer thus. Firſt; how is it poſſible to imagine two ſupreme powers in one nation, any more than two ſuns in one firmament? If the King be ſupreme, the parliament muſt be ſubordinate: if they ſupreme, then he ſubordinate. But then it is alleged, That the King challenged a power only co-ordinate that the parliament could do nothing without him, nor he without them. Under favor, two powers co-ordinate is as abſurd as the other: for tho', in quiet times, the commons have waited upon the King, and allowed him a negative voice in matters of leſs concernment, where delay could not prove dangerous to the people; yet when the commons ſhall vote, that the kingdom is in danger, unleſs the militia be ſo and ſo ſetled, if he will not then agree to it, they are bound in duty to do it themſelves: and it is impoſſible to imagine that ever any man ſhould have the peoples conſent to be their King upon other conditions; without which no man ever had right to wear the diadem: for conqueſt makes a title among wolves and bears, but not among men.

When the firſt agreement was concerning the power of parliaments, if the King ſhould have ſaid: Gentlemen; are you content to allow me any negative voice, that if you vote the kingdom to be in danger, unleſs ſuch an act paſs, if I refuſe to aſſent, ſhall nothing be done in that caſe? Surely no rational man but would have anſwered: may it pleaſe your majeſty; we ſhall uſe all dutiful means to procure your royal aſſent: but if you ſtill refuſe, we muſt not ſit ſtill, and ſee ourſelves ruined: we muſt and will ſave ourſelves, whether you will or no. And will any man ſay that the King's power is diminiſhed, becauſe he cannot hurt the people? Or that a man is leſs in health, who has many phyſicians to attend him? God is omnipotent, who cannot ſin; and all power is for the peoples good; but a Prince may not ſay, that is for the peoples good, which they ſee and feel to be for their hurt: and as for the malice the law implies, that, as when a thief ſets upon a man to rob him, he has no ſpite to the man, but love to the money: but it is an implied malice, that he will kill the people unleſs they will be ſlaves.

Q. "But, by what law is the King condemned?"

REP. By the fundamental law of this kingdom; by the general law of all nations, and the unanimous conſent of all rational men in the world, written in every man's heart, with the pen of a diamond, in capital letters, and a character ſo legible, that he who runs may read, viz. That when any man is intruſted with the ſword, for protection and preſervation of the people, if this man ſhall imploy to their deſtruction what was put into his hand for their ſafety, by the law of that land he becomes an enemy to that people, and deſerves the moſt exemplary and ſevere puniſhment can be invented. And this is the firſt neceſſary fundamental law of every kingdom, which, by intrinſical rules of government, muſt preſerve itſelf: and this law needed not be expreſſed, That, if a King become a Tyrant, he ſhall die for it; it is ſo naturally implied. We do not uſe to make laws which are for the preſervation of nature; that a man ſhould eat, and drink, and buy himſelf clothes, and injoy other natural comforts; no kingdom ever made any laws for it: and as we are to defend ourſelves, naturally, without any written law, from hunger and cold; ſo from outward violence; therefore, if a King would deſtroy a people, it is abſurd and ridiculous to aſk, by what law he is to die. And this law of nature is the law of God, written in the fleſhly tables of mens hearts; that, like the elder ſiſter, has a prerogative right of power before any poſitive law whatſoever: and this law of nature is an indubitable legiſlative authority of itſelf, which has a ſuſpenſive power over all human laws. If any man ſhall, by expreſs covenant under hand and ſeal, give power to another man to kill him, this is a void contract, being deſtructive to humanity. And, by the law of England, any act, or agreement, againſt the laws of God or nature; is a mere nullity: for as man has no hand in making the laws of God or nature; no more has he power to mar or alter them. If the pilot of a ſhip be drunk, and runing upon a rock; if the paſſengers cannot otherwiſe prevent it, they may throw him into the ſea to cool him: and this queſtion has received reſolution this parliament. When the militia of an army is commited to a general, it is not with any expreſs condition, that he ſhall not turn the mouths of his cannons againſt his own ſoldiers; for that is ſo naturally and neceſſarily implied, that it is needleſs to be expreſſed: inſomuch, as if he did attempt or command ſuch a thing againſt the nature of his truſt and place, it did "ipſo facto" eſtate the army in a right of diſobedience; unleſs any man be ſo groſly ignorant to think, that obedience binds men to cut their own throats, or their companions. Nor is this any ſecret of the law, which has lain hid from the begining, and now brought out to bring him to juſtice; but that which is connatural with every man, and innate in his judgment and reaſon and is as ancient as the firſt King, and an epidemical binding law to all nations in the world: for when many families agree, for the preſervation of human ſociety, to inveſt any King or governor with power and authority, upon the acceptance thereof, there is a mutual truſt and confidence between them, that the King ſhall improve his power for their good, and make it his work to procure their ſafeties, and they to provide for his honor; which is done to the common-wealth in him, as the ſword and enſigns of honor carried before the lord-mayor, are for the honor of the city. Now, as, when any one of this people ſhall compaſs the death of the governor, ruling well, this is a treaſon puniſhable with death, for the wrong done to the community, and Anathema be to ſuch a man; ſo when he, or they, who are truſted to fight the peoples battles, and to procure their welfare, ſhall prevaricate, and act to the inſlaving or deſtroying of the people, who are his liege lords, and all governors are but the peoples creatures, and the work of their hands, to be accountable as their ſtewards; and is it not ſenſeleſs for the veſſel to aſk the potter, by what law he calls it to account? this is high-treaſon with a witneſs, and far more tranſcendent than in the former caſe; becauſe the King was paid for his ſervice, and the dignity of the perſon does increaſe the offenſe. For a great man of noble education and knowledge, to betray ſo great a truſt, and abuſe ſo much love as the parliament ſhewed to the King, by petitioning him as good ſubjects, praying him as good chriſtians, adviſing him as good counſellors, and treating with him as the great council of the kingdom, with ſuch infinite care and tenderneſs of his honor; a courſe which God's people did not take with Rehoboam; they never petitioned him, but adviſed him; he refuſed their counſel and hearkened to young counſellors, and they cry, "To thy tents, O Iſrael:" and made quick and ſhort work of it: after all this, and much more longanimity and patience (which God exerciſes towards man to bring him to repentance) from the lord to the ſervant, for him not only to ſet up a ſtandard of war, in defiance of his dread ſovereign the people (for ſo they truly were in nature, tho' names have befooled us) but to perſiſt ſo many years in ſuch cruel perſecutions; who, with a word of his mouth, might have made a peace: If ever there was ſo ſuperlative a treaſon, let the Indians judge. And whoſoever ſhall break and violate ſuch a truſt and confidence, "Anathema Maranatha" be unto them.

Com. E. Leiceſter's caſe.

Q. "But, why was there not a written law, to make it "treaſon for the King to deſtroy the people, as well as for "a man to compaſs the King's death?

REP. Becauſe our anceſtors did never imagine, that any King of England would have been ſo deſperately mad, as to levy a war againſt the parliament and people; as, in the common inſtance of paricide, the Romans made no law againſt him who ſhould kill his father, thinking no child would be ſo unnatural as to be the death of him who was the author of his life: but when a child came to be accuſed for paricide there was a more cruel puniſhment inflicted, than for other homicides; for he was thrown into the ſea in a great leather barrel with a dog, a jackanapes, a cock, and a viper, ſignificant companions for him, to be deprived of all the elements, as in my "Poor man's caſe," fol. 10. Nor was there any law made againſt parents, who ſhould kill their children; yet if any man was ſo unnatural, he had an exemplary puniſhment.

OBJ. "But is it not a maxim in law, That the King can "do no wrong?"

REP. For any man to ſay ſo, is blaſphemy againſt the great God of truth and love: for only God cannot err; becauſe what he wills is right, becauſe he wills it: and it is a ſad thing to conſider, how learned men, for unworthy ends, ſhould uſe ſuch art to ſubdue the people, by tranſportation of their ſenſes, as to make them believe the law is, "That the King "can do no wrong."

Firſt, for law; I do aver it, with confidence, but in all humility, that there is no ſuch caſe to be found in law, That if the King rob, or murder, or commit ſuch horrid extravagancies, it is no wrong. Indeed the caſe is put in Hen. 7. by a chief judge, That "if the King kill a man, it is no felony, "to make him ſuffer death;" that is, to be meaned in ordinary courts of juſtice: but there is no doubt but the parliament might try the King, or appoint others to judge him for it. We find caſes in law, that the King has been ſued even in civil actions.

In 43 Edw. 3. c. 22. it is reſolved, That all manner of actions did lie againſt the King, as againſt any lord; and 24 Edw. 3. c. 23. Wilby a learned judge ſaid, That there was writ "Præ-"cipe Henrico Regi Angliæ."

Indeed, Edw. I. did make an act of ſtate, That men ſhould ſue to him by petition; but this was not agreed unto in parliament: Thelwal. tit. Roye Digeſt. of Writs, 71. But after, when judges places grew great, the judges and biteſheeps began to ſing "Lullaby," and ſpeak "Placentia" to the King, that "my Lord the King is an Angel of "Light:" now Angels are not reſponſible to men, but God; therefore not Kings. And the judges, they begin to make the King a God, and ſay; That, by law, his ſtile is "Sa-"cred Majeſty," tho' he ſwears ever hour; and "Gracious "Majeſty," tho' gracious men be the chief objects of his hatred; and that the King hath an Omnipotency and Omnipreſenſe.

But, I am ſure, there is no caſe in law, That if the King levy a war againſt the parliament, and people, it is not treaſon. Poſſibly, that caſe in H. 7. may prove, That if the King ſhould, in his paſſion, kill a man, this ſhall not be felony to take away the King's life; for the inconveniency may be greater to the people, by puting a King to death for one offenſe and miſcarriage, than the execution of juſtice upon him can advantage them. But what is this to a levying war againſt a parliament? Never any judge was ſo devoid of underſtanding, as to deny that to be treaſon. But ſuppoſe a judge, who held his place at the King's pleaſure, did ſo, I am ſure never any parliament ſaid ſo. But what if there had, in dark times of Popery, been an act made, That the King might murder, raviſh, burn and perpetrate all miſchiefs, and play reaks with impunity; will any man, who has but wit enough to meaſure an ell of cloth, or to tell twenty, ſay, That this is an obligation for men to ſtand ſtill, and ſuffer a monſter to cut their throats, and grant commiſſion to rob at Shuters-hill; as ſuch, and no better, are all legal thefts and oppreſſions. The doctor ſays, That a ſtatute againſt giving alms to a poor man is void: he is no ſtudent, I mean, was never bound 'prentice to reaſon, who ſays, a King cannot commit treaſon againſt the people.

OBJ. "But are there not negative words, in the ſtatute of "25 Edw. 3. That nothing elſe ſhall be conſtrued to be trea-"ſon, but what is there expreſſed?"

REP. That the ſtatute was intended for the peoples ſafety, that the King's judges ſhould not make traitors by the dozens, to gratify the King or courtiers; but it was never meaned to give the King liberty to deſtroy the people: and tho' it be ſaid, That the King and parliament only may declare treaſon; yet, no doubt, if the King will neglect his duty, it may be ſo declared without him: for when many are obliged to do any ſervice, if ſome of them fail, the reſt muſt do it.

OBJ. "But is there any precedent, that ever any man was "put to death who did not offend againſt ſome written law; "for where there is no law there is no tranſgreſſion."

REP. It is very true, where there is neither law of God, nor nature, nor poſitive law, there can be no tranſgreſſion; and therefore that ſcripture is much abuſed, to apply it only to laws poſitive. For,

1. "Ad ea quæ frequentius, &c." It is out of the ſphere of all earthly law-givers to comprehend and expreſs all particular caſes which may poſſibly happen, but ſuch as are of moſt frequent concurrence; particulars being different, like the ſeveral faces of men different from one another; elſe laws would be too tedious; and, as particulars occur, rational men will reduce them to general reaſons of ſtate, ſo as every thing may be adjudged for the good of the community.

2. The law of England is "Lex non ſcripta", and we have a direction in the epiſtle to the 3 Rep. That when our law-books are ſilent, we muſt repair to the law of nature and reaſon. Hollingſhed, and other hiſtorians tell us, That, in 20 H. 8. lord Hungerford was executed for buggery, for which there was then no poſitive law to make it felony: and before any ſtatute againſt witchcraft, many witches have been hanged in England, becauſe it is death by God's law. If any Italian mountebank ſhould come over hither, and give any man poiſon, which ſhould lie in his body above a year and a day, and then kill him, as it is reported they can give a man poiſon which ſhall conſume the body in three years; will any make ſcruple or queſtion to hang up ſuch a raſcal? At Naples, the great treaſurer of corn, being intruſted with many thouſand quarters, at three ſhillings per buſhel, for the common good, finding opportunity to ſell it for five ſhillings per buſhel to foreign merchants, inriched himſelf exceedingly thereby. Corn growing ſuddenly dear, and the council calling him to account for it, he proffered to allow three ſhillings for it, as it was delivered into his cuſtody, and hoped thereby to eſcape: but for ſo great a breach of truſt, nothing would content the people but to have him hanged; and tho' there was no poſitive law for it, to make it treaſon, yet it was reſolved, by the beſt politicians, that it was treaſon to break ſo great a truſt, by the fundamental conſtitution of the kingdom, and that for ſo great an offenſe he ought to die, who durſt preſume to inrich himſelf by that which might indanger the lives of ſo many citizens: for, as ſociety is natural, ſo governors muſt of neceſſity, and in all reaſon, provide for the preſervation and ſuſtenance of the meaneſt member; they who are but as the little toe of the body-politic.

But concerning Ireland, where there were no fewer than one hundred fifty two thouſand men, women and children moſt barbarouſly and ſatanically murdered, in the firſt four months of the rebellion, as appeared by ſubſtantial proofs, at the King's-Bench, on the trial of Macguire: if the King had a hand or but a little-finger in that maſſacre, every man will ſay, "Let him die the death:" but how ſhall we be aſſured of that? How can we know the tree, better than by its fruits? For my own particular, I have imployed many ſerious thoughts about it, and I deſire in doubtful caſes to give charity the upper-hand; but I cannot, in my conſcience, acquit him of it. Many ſtrong preſumptions, and ſeveral oaths of honeſt men, who have ſeen the King's commiſſion for it, cannot but amount to a clear proof. If I meet a man runing down ſtairs with a bloody ſword in his hand, and find a man ſtabed in the chamber, tho' I did not ſee this man run into the body by that man whom I met, yet if I were of the jury, I durſt not but find him guilty of the murder; and I cannot but admire any man ſhould deny that for him, which he durſt never deny for himſelf. How often was that monſtrous rebellion thrown in his diſh? and yet he durſt never abſolutely deny it. Never was Bear ſo unwillingly brought to the ſtake, as he was to declare againſt the rebels, and when he did once call them rebels, he would ſuffer but forty copies to be printed, and thoſe to be ſent to him ſealed: and he has ſince, above forty times, called them his ſubjects, his good ſubjects, and ſent to Ormond to give ſpecial thanks to ſome of theſe rebels, as Muſkerry and Plunket: which I am confident, by what I ſee of his height of ſpirit and undaunted reſolution at his trial and ſince, acting the laſt part, anſwerable to the former part of his life, he would rather have loſt his life, than to have ſent thanks to two ſuch incarnate devils, if he not been as guilty as themſelves. Queſtionleſs, if the King had not been guilty of that blood, he would have made a thouſand declarations againſt thoſe blood-hounds and hell-hounds, who are not to be named but with fire and brimſtone, and have ſent to all Princes in the world for aſſiſtance againſt ſuch accurſed devils in the ſhape of men: but he durſt not offend thoſe fiends and fire-brands; for if he had, I verily believe, they would ſoon have produced his commiſſion, under his hand and ſeal of Scotland at Edinburg, 1641, a copy whereof is in the parliament's hands, atteſted by oath, diſperſed by copies in Ireland, which cauſed the general rebellion.

OBJ. "He did not give commiſſion to kill the Engliſh, "but to take their forts, caſtles, towns and arms, and come "over and help him."

REP. And is it likely, all this could be effected without the ſlaughter of the poor Engliſh? Did the King ever call them rebels, but in forty proclamations, wrung from him forcibly, by the parliament's importunity? (murdering the Proteſtants was ſo acceptable to him!) and with this limitation, That none ſhould be publiſhed without his farther directions, as appears under Nicols's hand, now in the parliament's cuſtody. But the Scots were proclaimed rebels before they had killed a man, or had an army, and a prayer againſt them injoined in all churches; but no ſuch matter againſt the Iriſh.

Well; when the rebels were worſted in Ireland, the King makes war here to protect them, which, but for his fair words, had been prevented; often calling God to witneſs, he would as ſoon raiſe war on his own children: and men from Popiſh principles aſſiſt him. Well! we fought in jeſt, and were kept between wining and loſing: the King muſt not be too ſtrong, leſt he revenge himſelf; nor the parliament too ſtrong, for the commons would rule all; 'till Naſeby fight, and then the King could keep no more days of thankſgiving ſo well as we. Then he makes a ceſſation in Ireland, and many Iriſh came over to help him: Engliſh came over with Papiſts, who had ſcarce wiped their ſwords ſince they had killed their wives and children, and had their eſtates.

But thus I argue. The rebels knew that the King had proclamed them traitors, and forty copies were printed; and the firſt clauſe of an oath, injoined by the general-council of rebels, was, "To bear true faith and allegiance to King Charles, and "by all means to maintain his Royal prerogative, againſt the "Puritans in the parliament of England." Now, is any man ſo weak in his intellectuals, as to imagine that, if the rebels had, without the King's command or conſent, murdered ſo many Proteſtants, and he thereupon had really proclaimed them rebels, they would after this have taken a new oath to have maintained his prerogative? No, thoſe bloody devils had more wit than to fight in jeſt. If the King had once, in good earneſt, proclaimed them rebels, they would have burned their ſcabbards, and would not have ſtiled themſelves the King's and Queen's army, as they did. And truly, what the King ſaid for himſelf, That he would have adventured, to have gone in perſon, into Ireland, to ſuppreſs that rebellion, is but a poor argument to inforce any man's belief, that he was not guilty of the maſſacre: for it makes me rather think, that he had ſome hopes to have returned at the head of twenty or thirty thouſand rebels, to have deſtroyed this nation. For when the earl of Leiceſter was ſent, by the parliament, to ſubdue thoſe rebels, did not the King hinder him from going? And where not the clothes and proviſions, which were ſent by the parliament for the relief of the poor Proteſtants there, ſeized on by his command, and his men of war, and ſold or exchanged for arms and ammunition to deſtroy this parliament? And does not every man know, that the rebels in Ireland gave letters of mart for taking the parliament's ſhips, but freed the King's, as their very good friend's? And I have often heard it credibly reported, that the King ſhould ſay, That nothing more troubled him, but that there was not as much Proteſtant blood runing in England and Scotland, as in Ireland. And when that horrid rebellion began to break forth, how did the Papiſts here triumph and boaſt, that they hoped ere long to ſee London ſtreets run down in blood? And yet I do not think that the King was a Papiſt, or that he deſigned to introduce the Pope's ſupremacy in ſpiritual things into this kingdom: but thus it was. A Jeſuitical party at court was too prevalent in his councils, and ſome mungrel Proteſtants, who leſs hated the Papiſts than the Puritans, by the Queen's mediation joined all together to deſtroy the Puritans; hoping that the Papiſts and the Laodicean Proteſtants would agree well enough together. And laſtly, if it be ſaid, that if the King and the rebels were never fallen out, what need had Ormond to make a pacification, or peace, with them, by the King's commiſſion under the great-ſeal of Ireland? Truly there has been ſo much daubing, and ſo little plain-dealing, that I wonder how there comes to be ſo many beggars.

Concerning the betraying Rochel, to the inſlaving of the Proteſtant party in France, I confeſs, I heard ſo much of it, and was ſo ſhamefully reproached for it in Geneva, and by the Proteſtant miniſters in France, that I could believe no leſs than that the King was guilty of it. I have heard fearful exclamations, from the French Proteſtants, againſt the King and the late duke of Buckingham, for betraying Rochel; and ſome of the miniſters told me, ten years ſince, That God would be revenged of the wicked King of England, for betraying Rochel. And I have often heard Deodati ſay, concerning Henry IV of France, That the Papiſts had his body, but the Proteſtants had his heart and ſoul; but for the King of England, the Proteſtants had his body, but the Papiſts had his heart: not that I think he did believe Tranſubſtantiation; but I verily believe, that he loved a Papiſt better than a Puritan.

The duke of Rohan, who was a gallant honeſt man, and the King's godfather, would often ſay, "That all the blood "which was ſhed in Dauphiné would be caſt upon the King "of England's ſcore." For thus it was: The King ſent a letter to the Rochelers, by ſir William Beecher, to aſſure them, that he would aſſiſt them to the uttermoſt againſt the French King, for the liberty of their religion; conditionally, That they would not make any peace without him: and Montague was ſent into Savoy, and to the duke of Rohan, to aſſure them from the King, that thirty thouſand men ſhould be ſent out of England, to aſſiſt them againſt the French King, in three fleets; one to land in the iſle of Rheé; a ſecond in the river of Bourdeaux; and a third in Normandy. Upon this, the duke of Rohan, being general for the Proteſtants, not ſuſpecting that the French durſt aſſault him in Dauphiné (becauſe the King of England was ready to invade him as he had promiſed) drew out his army upon diſadvantage: whereupon the French King imployed all his army into Dauphiné againſt the Proteſtants, who were forced to retreat, and the duke of Rohan to flee to Geneva, and the Proteſtants to accept of peace upon very hard conditions, to ſtand barely at the King's devotion for their liberties, without any cautionary towns of aſſurance, as formerly they had; being ſuch a peace, as the ſheep make with the wolves, when the dogs are diſmiſſed. And the Proteſtants have, ever ſince, cryed out to this very day, It is not the French King who did us wrong, for then we could have borne it; but it was the King of England, a profeſſed Proteſtant, who betrayed us. And when I have many times intreated Deodati, and others, to have a good opinion of the King; he would anſwer me, That we are commanded to forgive our enemies, but not to forgive our friends.

There is a Frenck book, printed about two years ſince, called "Memoires du Monſieur de Rohan," where the King's horrid prefidiouſneſs, and deep diſſimulation, is very clearly unfolded and diſcovered. To inſtance but in ſome particulars; the King having ſolemly ingaged to the Rochelers, that he would hazard all the forces he had in his three kingdoms, rather than they ſhould periſh, did, in order thereunto, to gain credulity with them, ſend out eight ſhips to ſea, commanded by ſir John Pennington, to aſſiſt the Rochelers, as was pretended, but nothing leſs intended; for Pennington aſſiſted the French King againſt the Rochelers, which made ſir Ferdinando Gorge to go away with the Great Neptune, in deteſtation of ſo damnable a plot: and the Engliſh maſters and owners of ſhips refuſing to lend their ſhips to deſtroy the Rochelers, whom with their ſouls they deſired to relieve, Pennington, in a mad ſpite, ſhot at them.

Soubiſe, being agent here in England for the French Proteſtants, acquainted the King how baſely Pennington had dealed, and that the Engliſh ſhips had mowed down the Rochel ſhips like graſs, not only to the great danger and loſs of the Rochelers, but to the eternal diſhonor of this nation, ſcandal of our religion, and diſadvantage of the general affairs of all the Proteſtants in Chriſtendom. The King ſeems to be diſpleaſed, and ſays; "What a knave is this Pennington!" but whether it was not feigned, let all the world judge. But the thing being ſo plain, ſaid Soubiſe to the King, "Sir, why did the Engliſh "ſhips aſſiſt the French King, and thoſe who would not, were "ſhot at by your admiral? The French Proteſtants are no "fools; how can I make them believe that you intend their "welfare?" The King was much put to it for a ready anſwer, but at laſt thus it was patched up; That the French King had a deſign to be revenged on Genoua, for ſome former affront, and that the King lent him eight Engliſh ſhips to be imployed for Genoua;

Genoua; and that, ſailing towards Genoua, they met with ſome of the Rochelers accidentaly, and that the Engliſh did but look on, and could not help it, not having any commiſſion to fight, at that preſent: wherein the Rochelers might and would have declined a ſea-fight if they had not expected our aſſiſtance. But ſtill the poor Proteſtants were willing rather to blame Pennington than the King, who, in great ſeeming zeal, being ſurety for the laſt peace between the French King and his Proteſtant ſubjects, ſends Devick to the duke of Rohan, to aſſure him, that if Rochel was not ſpeedily ſet at liberty (which the French King had beſieged, contrary to his agreement) he would imploy his whole ſtrength, and in his own perſon ſee it performed. Which being not done, then the King ſends the duke of Buckingham to the iſle of Rheé, and gives new hopes of better ſucceſs to Soubiſe; commanding the admiral and officers in the fleet, in Soubiſe's hearing, to do nothing without his advice. But when the duke came to land at the iſle of Rheé, many gallant Engliſh loſt their lives, and the duke brought back three hundred tons of corn from the Rochelers, which he had borrowed of them, pretending a neceſſity for his Engliſh, which was but feigned, knowing it was a city impregnable, ſo long as they had proviſion within. I confeſs the Rochelers were not wiſe, to lend this duke their corn, conſidering how they had been dealed with. But what a baſe thing was it ſo to betray them, and to ſwear unto them, that they ſhould have corn enough ſent from England, before they wanted it! And for a long time, God did miraculouſly ſend them in a new kind of fiſh, which they never had before. But when the duke came to court, he made the honeſt Engliſh believe, that Rochel would ſuddenly be relieved, and that there was not the leaſt danger of the loſs of it: but ſecretary Cook, an honeſt underſtanding gentlemen, and the only friend at court to the Rochelers, laboring to improve his power to ſend ſome ſuccor to Rochel, was ſuddenly ſent away from court upon ſome ſleeveleſs errand, or, as ſome ſay, to Portſmouth, under color of providing corn for Rochel; but the duke ſoon after went thither, and ſaid, His life upon it, Rochel is ſafe enough. And the next day, Soubiſe being at Portſmouth, he preſſed the duke of Buckingham moſt importunately to ſend relief to Rochel, then or never. The duke told him, that he had juſt then heard good news of the victualing of Rochel, which he was going to tell the King: which Soubiſe making doubt of, the duke affirmed it by an oath; and having the words in his mouth, he was ſtabbed by Felton, and inſtantly died. The poor Rochelers ſeeing themſelves ſo betrayed, exclaimed on the Engliſh and were conſtrained thro' famine to ſurrender the city; yet new aſſurances came from the King to the duke of Rohan, that he ſhould never be abandoned, and that he ſhould not be diſmayed nor aſtoniſhed for the loſs of Rochel.

But Soubiſe ſpoke his mind freely at court, that the Engliſh had betrayed Rochel, and that the loſs of that city was the apparent perdition and loſs of thirty two places of ſtrength from the French Proteſtants in Languedoc, Piedmont, and Dauphiné: therefore it was thought fit that he ſhould have a fig given him to ſtop his mouth. Well; not long after, two capuchins were ſent into England to kill honeſt Soubiſe, and the one of them diſcovered the other. Soubiſe rewarded the diſcoverer, and demanded juſtice here againſt the other, who was a priſoner; but by what means you may eaſily imagine, that aſſaſſinate raſcal, inſtead of being whiped, or receiving ſome more ſevere puniſhment, was releaſed, and ſent back into France with money in his purſe: and one of the meſſengers, who was ſent from Rochel to complain of thoſe abominable treacheries, was taken here; and, as the duke of Rohan writes, was hanged for ſome pretended felony or treaſon: and much more to this purpoſe may be found in the duke of Rohan's memorials. But yet I know many wiſe ſober men do acquit the King from the guilt of the loſs of Rochel, and lay it upon the duke, as if it were but a loſs of his reputation. They ſay, that the duke of Buckingham agitated his affairs neither for religion, nor the honor of his maſter; but only to ſatisfy his paſſion in certain fooliſh vows which he made in France, entered upon a war: and that the buſineſs miſcarried thro' ignorance, and for want of underſtanding to manage ſo difficult a negociation, he being unfit to be either admiral or general.

I confeſs that, for many years, I was of that opinion, and thought the King was ſeduced by evil counſel; and ſome thought Buckingham and others ruled him as a child, and durſt do what they liſt: but certainly he was too politic and ſubtil a man to be ſwayed by any thing but his own judgment. Since Naſeby-letters, I ever thought him principal in all tranſactions of ſtate, and the wiſeſt about him but acceſſaries. He never acted by any implicit faith in ſtate-matters: the proudeſt of them all durſt never croſs him in any deſign, when he had once reſolved upon it. Is any man ſo ſoft-brained to think, that the duke, or Pennington, durſt betray Rochel without his command? Would not he have hanged them up at their return, if they had wilfully tranſgreſſed his commands? A thouſand ſuch excuſes made for him, are but like Iriſh quagmires, which have no ſolid ground or foundation in reaſon. He was well known to be a great ſtudent in his younger days, that his father would ſay, He muſt make him a biſhop. He had more learning and dexterity in ſtate-affairs, undoubtedly, than all the Kings in Chriſtendom: if he had had grace anſwerable to his ſtrong parts, he had been another Solomon; but his wit and knowledge proved like a ſword in a mad-man's hand: he was a ſtranger to the work of grace and the ſpirit of God; and all thoſe meanders in ſtate, his ſerpentine turnings and windings, have but brought him to ſhame and confuſion. But I am fully ſatisfied, none of his council durſt ever adviſe him to any thing, but what they knew before he reſolved to have done; and that they durſt as well take a bear by the tooth, as do, or conſent to the doing of any thing, but what they knew would pleaſe him: they did but hew and ſquare the timber, he was the maſter-builder who gave the form to every architecture: and being ſo able and judicious to diſcern of every man's merits, never think that the duke, or Pennington, or any judge or officer, did ever any thing for his advantage without his command, againſt law or honor.

Upon all which premiſes, may it pleaſe your lordſhip, I do humbly demand and pray the juſtice of this High-court; and yet not I, but the innocent blood, which has been ſhed in theſe three kingdoms, demands juſtice againſt him. This blood is vocal, and cries aloud, and yet ſpeaks no better, but much louder than the blood of Abel; for what proportion has the blood of that righteous man, to the blood of ſo many thouſand? If King Ahab and Queen Jezabel, for the blood of one righteous Naboth (who would not ſell his inheritance for the full value) were juſtly put to death; what puniſhment does he deſerve, who is guilty of the blood of thouſands, and fought for a pretended prerogative, that he might have any man's eſtate which he liked, without paying for it? This blood has long cried; How long parliament, how long army, will ye forbear to avenge our blood? Will ye not do juſtice upon the capital author of all injuſtice? When will ye take the proud lion by the beard which defies you with imperious exultations? What is the houſe of commons? What is the army? As Pharaoh ſaid, "Who is the Lord? and who is Moſes?" I am not accountable to any power on earth; thoſe who were murdered at Brentford, knocked on the head in the water, and thoſe honeſt ſouls who were killed in cold blood at Bolton and Liverpool in Lancaſhire, at Bartomly in Cheſhire, and many other places, their blood cries night and day for juſtice againſt him; their wives and their children cry, "Juſtice upon the murderer, "or elſe give us our fathers and huſbands again." Nay, ſhould the people be ſilent, the very ſtones and timber of the houſes would cry for juſtice againſt him. But, my lord, before I pray judgment, I humbly crave leave to ſpeak to two particulars. 1. Concerning the priſoner. When I conſider what he was, and how many prayers have been made for him, tho' I know that all the world cannot reſtore him nor ſave his life, becauſe God will not forgive his temporal puniſhment; yet if God, in him, will be pleaſed to add one example more to the church of his unchangeable love to his elect in Chriſt, not knowing but that he may belong to the election of grace; I am troubled in my ſpirit, in regard of his eternal condition, for fear that he ſhould depart this life without love and reconciliation to all thoſe ſaints whom he hath ſcorned under the notion of Preſbyterians, Anabaptiſts, Independents and Sectaries. It cannot be denied, but that he hath paſſed all his days in unmeaſurable pride; that, during his whole reign, he has deported himſelf as a God, been depended upon, and adored as God; who has challenged and aſſumed an omnipotent power, an earthly omnipotence; who with the breath of his mouth has diſſolved parliaments; his "Non placet" has made all the counſels of that ſupreme court to become abortives. "Non "curo" has been his motto, who, inſtead of being honored as good Kings ought to be, and no more, has been idolized and adored, as our good God only ought to be. A man who has ſhot all his arrows againſt the upright in the land; hated

Chriſt in his members; ſwallowed down unrighteouſneſs as the ox drinks water; eſteemed the needy as his footſtool; cruſhed honeſt public-ſpirited men, and grieved when he could not afflict the honeſt more than he did; counted it the beſt art and policy to ſuppreſs the righteous, and to give way to his courtiers ſo to gripe, grind, oppreſs and over-reach the free people of this land, that he might do what he liſt (the remembrance whereof would pierce his ſoul, if he knew the precioufneſs of it) but all ſins to an infinite mercy are equally pardonable: therefore my prayer for this poor wretch ſhall be, That God would ſo give him repentance to life, that he may believe in that Chriſt, whom he hath impriſoned, perſecuted and murdered in the ſaints; that he who has lived a tyrant, and hated nothing ſo much as holineſs, may die a convert, and in love to the ſaints in England; that ſo the tears of the oppreſſed and the afflicted may not be as ſo many fiery ſtinging ſerpents, cauſing an eternal deſpairing, continual horror to this miſerable man, when all tyrants ſhall be aſtoniſhed, and innocent blood will affright more than twelve legions of devils. All the hurt I wiſh to him, is, That he may look the ſaints in the face with comfort; for the ſaints muſt judge the world: and however it may be, he or his adherents may think it a brave Roman ſpirit, not to repent of any thing, nor expreſs ſorrow for any ſin, tho' never ſo horrid, taking more care and fear not to change their countenance upon the ſcaffold, than what ſhall become of them after death; yet I beſeech your lordſhip, that I may tell him, and all the malignants now living, but this; Charles Stuart, unleſs you depart this life in love and reconciliation to all thoſe ſaints and godly men, whom you have either ignorantly or maliciouſly oppoſed, mocked, and perſecuted, and ſtill ſcorn and jeer at, as heretics and ſectaries, there is no more hopes for you ever to ſee God in comfort, than for me to touch the heavens with my finger, or with a word to annihilate this great building, or for the devil to be ſaved; which he might be, if he could love a ſaint as ſuch. No, ſir, it will be too late for you to ſay to thoſe ſaints, whom you have defied, Give me ſome of your holineſs, that I may behold God's angry countenance. You can expect no anſwer, but, Go buy, ſir, of thoſe ſoul-huckſters, your biſhops, who fed you with chaff and poiſon; and now you muſt feed upon fire and brimſtone to all eternity.

2. Concerning myſelf, I bear no more malice to the man's perſon, than I do to my dear father; but I hate that curſed principle of tyranny, which has ſo long lodged and harbored within him, which has turned our waters of law into blood. And therefore, upon that malignant principle, I hope this High-court (which is a habitation of juſtice, and a royal palace of principles of freedom) will do ſpeedy juſtice; that this lion which has devoured ſo many ſheep, may not only be removed out of the way, but that this iron ſcepter, which has been lifted up to break this poor nation in pieces like a potter's veſſel, may be wreſted out of the hands of tyrants; that my honorable clients (for whom I am a moſt unworthy advocate) the people of England, may not only taſte, but drink abundantly of thoſe ſweet waters of that well of liberty, which this renowned army has digged with their ſwords, which was ſtoped by the Philiſtines, the fierce Jew, and uncircumciſed Canaanite; the hopes whereof made me readily hearken to the call to this ſervice, as if it had been immediately from heaven, being fully ſatisfied, that the priſoner was long ſince condemned to die by God's law, which being more noble and ancient than any law of man, if there had been a ſtatute that he ſhould not die, yet he ought to be put to death notwithſtanding; and that this High-court was but to pronounce the ſentence and judgment written againſt him. And tho' I might have been ſufficiently diſcouraged, in reſpect that my reaſon is far leſs than others of my profeſſion; yet, conſidering that there are but two things deſirable, to make a dumb man eloquent, namely, a good cauſe, and good judges; the firſt whereof procures the juſtice of heaven, and the ſecond, juſtice upon earth; and thinking that happily God might make uſe of one mean man at the bar, among other learned counſel, that more of his mind might appear in it (for many times the leſs there is of man, the more God's glory does appear; and hitherto very much of the mind of God has appeared in this action) I went as cheerfully about it, as to a weding. And that the glory of this adminiſtration may be wholly given to God, I deſire to obſerve, to the praiſe of his great name, the work of God upon my own ſpirit, in his gracious aſſiſtance and preſenſe with me, as a return of prayer, and fruit of faith; believing that God never calls to the acting of any thing ſo pleaſing to him, as this moſt excellent court of juſtice is, but he is preſent with the honorable judges, and thoſe who wait upon them. I have been ſometimes of counſel againſt felons and priſoners; but I never moved the court to proceed to judgment againſt any felon, or to keep any man in priſon, but I trembled at it in my thoughts, as thinking it would be eaſier to give account of mercy and indulgence, than of any thing which might look like rigor: but now my ſpirits are quite of another temper, and I hope it is meat and drink to good men to have juſtice done; and recreation to think what benefit this nation will receive by it.

And now, my lord, I muſt, as the truth is, conclude him guilty of more tranſcendent treaſons, and enormous crimes, than all the Kings in this part of the world have ever been. And as he who would picture Venus, muſt take the eyes of one, the cheeks of another beautiful woman, and ſo other parts, to make a complete beauty; ſo to delineate an abſolute tyrant, the cruelty of Richard the Third, and all the ſubtilty, treachery, deep diſſimulation, abominable projects, and diſhonorable ſhifts, which ever were ſeparately in any who ſwayed the Engliſh ſcepter, conſpired together to make their habitation in this whited wall. Therefore I humbly pray, That as he has made himſelf a precedent in commiting ſuch horrid acts, which former Kings and ages knew not, and have been afraid to think of, That your lordſhip and this High-court, out of your ſublime wiſdoms, and for juſtice-ſake, would make him an example for other kingdoms for the time to come, that the Kings of the earth may hear and fear, and do no more ſo wickedly; that he, who would not be a pattern of virtue, and example of juſtice in his life, may be a precedent of juſtice to others by his death.

The Journal of the High-court of Juſtice, for the trial of King CHARLES I; as it was read in the Houſe of Commons, and atteſted under the hand of Phelps, clerk to that court; with additions by J. Nalſon, L.L.D.

Act of the Commons of England, aſſembled in parliament, for erecting a High-court of Juſtice, for the trying and judging of Charles Stuart, King of England.

" WHereas it is notorious, That Charles Stuart, the " now King of England, not content with thoſe many " incroachments which his predeceſſors had made " upon the people in their rights and freedoms, has " had a wicked deſign totally to ſubvert the ancient and fun- " damental laws and liberties of this nation, and in their place " to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government; and " that beſide all other evil ways and means to bring this deſign " to paſs, he has proſecuted it with fire and ſword, levied and " maintained a cruel war in the land, againſt the parliament " and kingdom; whereby the country has been miſerably " waſted; the public treaſure exhauſted; trade decayed; thou- " ſands of people murdered, and infinite other miſchiefs com- " mited; for all which high and treaſonable offenſes, the ſaid " Charles Stuart might long ſince juſtly have been brought to " exemplary and condign puniſhment. Whereas alſo the par- " liament, well hoping that the reſtraint and impriſonment of " his perſon, after it had pleaſed God to deliver him into " their hands, would have quieted the diſtempers of the king- " dom, did forbear to proceed judicially againſt him; but " found by ſad experience, that ſuch their remiſſneſs ſerved only " to incourage him and his complices in the continuance of " their evil practiſes, and in raiſing new commotions, rebel" lions and invaſions: for prevention therefore of the like,

" or greater inconveniencies, and to the end no chief officer
" or magiſtrate whatſoever may hereafter preſume traitorouſly
" and maliciouſly to imagine or contrive the inſlaving or de-" ſtroying of the Engliſh nation, and to expect impunity for
" ſo doing: Be it ordained and inacted by the commons in

And in order to the more regular and due proceedings of the ſaid court, they nominate officers; and accordingly choſe mr. Aſke, dr. Doriſlaus, mr. Steel, and mr. Cook, counſel, to attend the ſaid court; mr. Greaves and mr. John Phelps, clerks; to whom notice thereof was ordered to be given.

About ten that day, the ſaid ſerjeant, being attended with ſix trumpets, and a guard of two troops of horſe, himſelf with ten on horſe-back, bearing his mace, rode into the middle of Weſtminſter-hall (the court of Chancery then ſiting at a general ſeal) where, after the ſaid trumpet ſounding (drums then likewiſe beating in Palace-yard) he cauſed the ſaid precept to be openly read: which being done, the houſe of commons, then alſo ſiting, order as follows; viz.

The court being ſat in the place aforeſaid, began to take into conſideration the manner and order which they intended to obſerve at the King's trial, and appointed two uſhers of the court, viz. Mr. Edward Walford and mr. Vowel; and mr. Litchman was choſen a meſſenger to the court.

John Bradſhaw, ſerjeant at law, a commiſſioner of this court, was then choſen preſident of the ſaid court; who being abſent, mr. Say, one of the commiſſioners then preſent, was appointed preſident "pro tempore," and until ſerjeant Bradſhaw ſhould attend the ſaid ſervice. Mr. Say accordingly took his place, and gave the court's thanks to mr. Garland, one of the commiſſioners of this court, for his great pains by him formerly taken about the court's buſineſs.

The court were informed of the great and important imployment which at preſent lay upon mr. Greaves, in behalf of the common-wealth, from which he cannot be ſpared, without prejudice to the public; and it was therefore moved in his behalf, that he might be excuſed from attending the ſervice of one of the clerks of the ſaid court; which the court admited as a ſufficient excuſe. And thereupon mr. Andrew Broughton was named and appointed one of the clerks of this court, with John Phelps. The ſaid John Phelps being then ſent for by a meſſenger of the court, and accordingly making his appearance, was commanded to attend the ſaid ſervice; who attended the ſame accordingly. And a meſſenger of the court was ſent to ſummon the ſaid mr. Broughton.

Mr. Aſke, mr. Steel, dr. Doriſlaus, and mr. Cook, were appointed counſel in the behalf of the common-wealth, to prepare and proſecute the charge againſt the King, according to the act of the commons aſſembled in parliament in that behalf; and, in particular, the court did appoint mr. Steel attorney, and mr. Cook ſollicitor, to take care thereof. This done, the court commanded the ſerjeant at arms to ſend for the priſoner: and thereupon col. Thomlinſon, who had the charge of the priſoner, within a quarter of an hour's ſpace brought him, attended by col. Hacker, and thirty-two officers with partizans, guarding him to the court, his own ſervants immediately attending him.

Being thus brought up in the face of the court, the ſerjeant at arms with his mace received and conducted him ſtrait to the bar, having a crimſon velvet chair ſet before him. After a ſtern looking upon the court, and the people in the galleries on each ſide of him, he placed himſelf in the chair, not at all moving his hat, or otherwiſe ſhewing the leaſt reſpect to the court; but preſently roſe up again, and turned about, looking downwards upon the guards placed on the left ſide, and on the multitude of ſpectators on the right ſide of the ſaid great hall: the guard which attended him in the mean time dividing themſelves on each ſide the court, and his own ſervants, following him to the bar, ſtood on the left hand of the priſoner.

The priſoner having again placed himſelf in his chair, with his face towards the court, and ſilence being again ordered and proclaimed, the lord-preſident, in the name of the court, addreſſed himſelf to the priſoner, acquainting him, That the commons of England aſſembled in Parliament, being deeply ſenſible of the evils and calamities that had been brought upon this nation, and of the innocent blood which had been ſpilled in it, which was fixed upon him as the principal author of it, had reſolved to make inquiſition for this blood; and according to the debt they did owe to God, to juſtice, the kingdom, and themſelves, and according to the fundamental power which reſted, and truſt repoſed in them by the people, other means failing thro' his default, had reſolved to bring him to trial and judgment; and had therefore conſtituted that court of juſtice, before which he was then brought, where he was to hear his charge, upon which the court would proceed according to juſtice.

Hereupon mr. Cook, ſollicitor for the common-wealth, ſtanding within a bar, with the reſt of the counſel for the common-wealth, on the right hand of the priſoner, offered to ſpeak; but the priſoner having a ſtaff in his hand, held it up, and ſoftly laid it upon the ſaid mr. Cook's ſhoulder, twice or thrice, biding him, Hold. Nevertheleſs, the lord-preſident ordering him to go on, mr. Cook did, according to the order of the court to him directed, in the name, and on the behalf of the people of England, exhibit a charge of high-treaſon, and other high crimes, and did therewith accuſe the ſaid Charles Stuart, King of England; praying in the name, and on the behalf aforeſaid, that the charge might be accordingly received and read, and due proceedings had thereupon. And accordingly prefer'd a charge in writing, which being received by the court, and delivered to the clerk of the court, the lord-preſident, in the name of the court, ordered it ſhould be read.

But the King interrupting the reading it, the court notwithſtanding commanded the clerk to read it; acquainting the priſoner, that if he had any thing to ſay after, the court would hear him: whereupon the clerk read the charge, the tenor whereof is as follows; viz:

A charge of high-treaſon, and other high crimes, exhibited to the High-court of Juſtice by John Cook, eſq; ſollicitor-general, appointed by the ſaid court, for and on the behalf of the people of England, againſt Charles Stuart, king of England.

" THAT he, the ſaid Charles Stuart, being admited " King of England, and therein truſted with a limited " power to govern by and according to the laws of the land, " and not otherwiſe; and by his truſt, oath and office, being " obliged to uſe the power commited to him, for the good " and benefit of the people, and for the preſervation of their " rights and liberties: yet nevertheleſs, out of a wicked deſign " to erect and uphold in himſelf an unlimited and tyrannical " power to rule according to his will, and to overthrow the " rights and liberties of the people; yea to take away " and make void the foundations thereof, and of all redreſs " and remedy of miſgovernment, which by the fundamental " conſtitutions of this kingdom were reſerved on the peoples " behalf, in the right and power of frequent and ſucceſſive " parliaments, or national meetings in council; he the ſaid " Charles Stuart, for accompliſhment of ſuch his deſigns, and " for the protecting of himſelf and his adherents, in his and " their wicked practiſes, to the ſame ends, has traiterouſly and " maliciouſly levied war againſt the preſent parliament, and " the people therein repreſented. Particularly, upon or about " the thirtieth day of June, in the year of our Lord 1642, at " Beverley in the county of York; and upon or about the " thirtieth day of July in the year aforeſaid, in the county of " the city of York; and upon or about the four and twentieth " day of Auguſt in the ſame year, at the county of the town " of Notingham, where, and when he ſet up his ſtandard of " war; and alſo on or about the twenty-third day of October, " in the ſame year, at Edge-hill and Keynton-field, in the " county of Warwick; and on or about the thirtieth day of " November, in the ſame year, at Brentford, in the county " of Middleſex; and on or about the thirtieth day of Auguſt, " in the year of our Lord 1643, at Caverſham-bridge near " Reading, in the county of Berks; and on or about the thir- " tieth day of October, in the laſt year mentioned, at or near " the city of Gloceſter; and on or about the thirtieth day of " November, in the year laſt mentioned, at Newbury, in the " county of Berks; and on or about the thirty-firſt day of " July, in the year of our Lord 1644, at Cropredy-bridge, " in the county of Oxon; and on or about the thirtieth day of " September, in the laſt year mentioned, at Bodmyn, and " other places near adjacent, in the county of Cornwal; and " on or about the thirtieth day of November, in the year laſt " mentioned, at Newbury aforeſaid; and on or about the " eighth day of June, in the year of our Lord 1645, at the " town of Leiceſter; and alſo on the fourteenth day of the " ſame month, in the ſame year, at Naſeby-field in the county " of Northampton. At which ſeveral times and places, or " moſt of them, and at many other places in this land, at " ſeveral other times within the years afore-mentioned, and " in the year 1646, he the ſaid Charles Stuart, has cauſed " and procured many thouſands of the free people of this " nation to be ſlain; and by diviſions, parties, and inſur- " rections within this land, by invaſions from foreign parts, " indeavored and procured by him, and by many other evil " ways and means, he, the ſaid Charles Stuart has not only " maintained and carried on the ſaid war, both by land and " ſea, during the years before mentioned, but alſo has renewed " or cauſed to be renewed the ſaid war againſt the parliament " and good people of this nation, in this preſent year 1648, " in the counties of Kent, Eſſex, Surrey, Suſſex, Middleſex, " and many other places of England and Wales; and alſo by " ſea. And particularly, he, the ſaid Charles Stuart, has for " that purpoſe given commiſſion to his ſon the Prince, and " and others; whereby, beſide multitudes of other perſons, " many ſuch as were by the parliament intruſted and imployed " for the ſafety of the nation (being by him or his agents " corrupted to the betraying their truſt, and revolting from

" the parliament) have had entertainment and commiſſion for " the continuing and renewing of war and hoſtility againſt " the ſaid parliament and people as aforeſaid. By which cruel " and unnatural wars, by him, the ſaid Charles Stuart, levied, " continued and renewed as aforeſaid, much innocent blood " of the free people of this nation has been ſpilled, many " families have been undone, the public treaſure waſted and " exhauſted, trade obſtructed and miſerably decayed, vaſt " expenſe and damage to the nation incurred, and many " parts of this land ſpoiled, ſome of them even to deſolation. " And for farther proſecution of his ſaid evil deſigns, he, " the ſaid Charles Stuart, doth ſtill continue his commiſſions " to the ſaid Prince, and other rebels and revolters, both " Engliſh and foreigners, and to the earl of Ormond, and " to the Iriſh rebels and revolters aſſociated with him; from " whom farther invaſions upon this land are threatened, upon " the procurement and on the behalf of the ſaid Charles Stuart.

" All which wicked deſigns, wars and evil practiſes of him, " the ſaid Charles Stuart, have been and are carried on for " the advancement and upholding of a perſonal intereſt of " will and power, and pretended prerogative to himſelf and " his family, againſt the public intereſt, common right, li- " berty, juſtice and peace of the people of this nation, by " and for whom he was intruſted as aforeſaid.

" By all which it appears, that he, the ſaid Charles Stuart, " has been, and is the occaſioner, author and continuer of the " ſaid unnatural, cruel, and bloody wars, and therein guilty " of all the treaſons, murders, rapines, burnings, ſpoils, de- " ſolations, damages, and miſchiefs to this nation, acted " and commited in the ſaid wars, or occaſioned thereby.

" And the ſaid John Cook by proteſtation ſaving, on the " behalf of the ſaid people of England, the liberty of exhi- " biting at any time hereafter any other charge againſt the " ſaid Charles Stuart, and alſo of replying to the anſwers which " the ſaid Charles Stuart ſhall make to the premiſes, or any " of them, or any other charge which ſhall be ſo exhibited; " does for the ſaid treaſons and crimes, on the behalf of the " ſaid people of England, impeach the ſaid Charles Stuart as " a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable " enemy to the common-wealth of England; and pray, that " the ſaid Charles Stuart, King of England, may be put to " anſwer all and every the premiſes; and that ſuch proceed- " ings, examinations, trials, ſentences and judgments may " be thereupon had, as ſhall be agreeable to juſtice.

Subſcribed, John Cook.

The priſoner, while the charge was reading, ſat down in his chair, looking ſometimes on the High-court, and ſometimes on the galleries; and roſe again, and turned about to behold the guard and ſpectators, and after ſat down, looking very ſternly, and with a countenance not at all moved, 'till theſe words, viz. Charles Stuart to be a tyrant, traitor, &c. were read; at which he laughed, as he ſat, in the face of the court.

The charge being read, the lord-preſident, in name of the court, demanded the priſoner's anſwer thereto.

But the priſoner declining that, fell into a diſcourſe of the late treaty in the Iſle of Wight, and demanded, by what lawful authority he was brought from the iſle thither? upbraiding the court with the many unlawful authorities in the world, inſtancing in robbers and takers of purſes; pleading his Kingſhip, and thereby a truſt commited to him from God, by deſcent, which he ſhould betray, together with the liberties of the people, in caſe he ſhould anſwer to any unlawful power, which he charged the court to be, and that they were raiſed by uſurped power; and affirmed, that he ſtood more for the liberties of the people, than any of the judges there ſiting: and again demanded, by what authority he was brought thither?

To which it was replied by the court, That had he been pleaſed to have obſerved what was declared to him by the court, at his firſt coming, and the charge which he had heard read unto him, he might have informed himſelf by what authority he was brought before them; namely, by the authority of the commons of England aſſembled in parliament, on the behalf of the people of England: and did therefore again ſeveral times adviſe him to conſider of a better anſwer; which he refuſed to do, but perſiſted in his contumacy. Whereupon the court at length told him, That they did expect from him a poſitive anſwer to the charge; affirming their authority, and giving him to underſtand, that they were upon God's and the kingdom's errand, and that the peace ſtood for would be better had and kept when juſtice was done, and that was their preſent work: and adviſed him ſeriouſly to conſider what he had to do at his next appearance; which was declared ſhould be upon Monday following, and ſo remanded him to his former cuſtody.

The priſoner, having all the while kept on his hat, departed, without ſhewing any the leaſt reſpect to the court: but going out of the bar, ſaid, " He did not fear that bill;" pointing to the table where the ſword and charge lay.

The priſoner being withdrawn, three proclamations were made, and the court adjourned to the Painted-chamber, on Monday morning then next at nine; declaring, that from thence they intended to adjourn to the ſame place again.

[But that the reader may have the intire relation of this deplorable tragedy, I have, from the moſt authentic prints inſerted at large the interlocutory paſſages between the King and Bradſhaw, of which mr. Phelps, in his journal, gives only a ſuccinct account; which take as follows.]

His Majeſty with his wonted patience heard all theſe ſlanders and reproaches, ſiting in the chair, and looking ſometimes on the pretended court, ſometimes up to the galleries; and riſing again, turned about to behold the guards and ſpectators: then he ſat down, with a majeſtic and unmoved countenance, and ſometimes ſmiling, eſpecially at thoſe words, Tyrant, Traitor, and the like.

Alſo the ſilver head of his ſtaff happened to fall off, at which he wondered; and ſeeing none to take it up, he ſtooped for it himſelf.

The charge being read, Bradſhaw began:

Sir, You have now heard your charge read, containing ſuch matters as appear in it: You find that, in the cloſe of it, it is prayed to the court, in the behalf of the commons of England, that you anſwer to your charge. The court expects your anſwer.

KING. I would know by what power I am called hither; I was not long ago in the Iſle of Wight, how I came there, is a longer ſtory than I think is fit at this time for me to ſpeak of; but there I entered into a treaty with both houſes of parliament, with as much public faith as it is poſſible to be had of any people in the world. I treated there with a number of honorable lords and gentlemen, and treated honeſtly and uprightly; I cannot ſay but they did very nobly with me, we were upon a concluſion of the treaty. Now I would know by what authority, I mean lawful; there are many unlawful authorities in the world, thieves and robbers by the high-ways; but I would know by what authority I was brought from thence, and carried from place to place, and I know not what: and when I know by what lawful authority, I ſhall anſwer. Remember I am your King, your lawful King, and what ſins you bring upon your heads, and the judgment of God upon this land; think well upon it, I ſay think well upon it, before you go farther from one ſin to a greater: therefore let me know, by what lawful authority I am ſeated here, and I ſhall not be unwilling to anſwer. In the mean time I ſhall not betray my truſt; I have a truſt commited to me by God, by old and lawful deſcent, I will not betray it, to anſwer to a new unlawful authority: therefore reſolve me that, and you ſhall hear more of me.

BRADSHAW. If you had been pleaſed to have obſerved what was hinted to you by the court, at your firſt coming hither, you would have known by what authority; which authority requires you, in the name of the people of England, of which you are elected King, to anſwer.

KING. No ſir, I deny that.

BRADSHAW. If you acknowledge not the authority of the court they muſt proceed.

KING. I do tell them ſo, England was never an elective kingdom, but an hereditary kingdom for near theſe thouſand years; therefore let me know by what authority I am called hither: I do ſtand more for the liberty of my people, than any here who come to be my pretended judges; and therefore let me know by what lawful authority I am ſeated here, and I will anſwer it; otherwiſe I will not anſwer it.

BRADSHAW. Sir, how well you have managed your truſt, is known: your way of anſwer is to interrogate the court, which beſeems you not in this condition. You have been told of it twice or thrice.

KING. Here is a gentleman, lieutenant-colonel Cobbet; aſk him, if he did not bring me from the Iſle of Wight by force. I do not come here as ſubmiting to the court: I will ſtand as much for the privilege of the houſe of commons, rightly underſtood, underſtood, as any man here whatſoever. I ſee no houſe of lords here, which may conſtitute a parliament; and the King too ſhould have been. Is this the bringing of the King to his parliament? Is this the bringing an end to the treaty in the public faith of the world? Let me ſee a legal authority warranted by the word of God, the ſcriptures, or warranted by the conſtitutions of the kingdom, and I will anſwer.

BRADSHAW. Sir, you have propounded a queſtion, and have been anſwered. Seeing you will not anſwer, the court will conſider how to proceed: in the mean time, they who brought you hither, are to take charge of you back again. The court deſires to know, whether this be all the anſwer you will give, or no.

KING. Sir, I deſire that you would give me, and all the world, ſatisfaction in this: let me tell you, it is not a ſlight thing you are about. I am ſworn to keep the peace, by that duty I owe to God and my country, and I will do it to the laſt breath of my body; and therefore you ſhall do well to ſatisfy firſt God, and then the country, by what authority you do it: if you do it by an uſurped authority, you cannot anſwer it. There is a God in heaven, who will call you, and all that give you power, to account. Satisfy me in that, and I will anſwer; otherwiſe I betray my truſt, and the liberties of the people: and therefore think of that, and then I ſhall be willing. For I do avow, that it is as great a ſin to withſtand lawful authority, as it is to ſubmit to a tyrannical or any other ways unlawful authority: and therefore ſatisfy God and me, and all the world in that, and you ſhall receive my anſwer. I am not afraid of that bill.

BRADSHAW. The court expects you ſhould give them a final anſwer, their purpoſe is to adjourn to Monday next: if you do not ſatisfy yourſelf, tho' we do tell you our authority; we are ſatisfied with our authority, and it is upon God's authority and the kingdom's; and that peace you ſpeak of will be kept in the doing of juſtice, and that is our preſent work.

KING. For anſwer, let me tell you, you have ſhewn no lawful authority to ſatisfy any reaſonable man.

BRADSHAW. That is in your apprehenſion; we are ſatisfied, who are your judges.

KING. It is not my apprehenſion, nor yours neither, which ought to decide it.

BRADSHAW. The court has heard you, and you are to be diſpoſed of as they have commanded.

So commanding the guard to take him away, his Majeſty only replied, Well, Sir!

And at his going down, pointing with his ſtaff towards the ſword *, he ſaid, "I do not fear that."

As he went down ſtairs, the people in the hall cried out, "God ſave the King!" notwithſtanding ſome were ſet there by the faction to lead the clamor for juſtice. [Nalſon.]

Sixty two Commiſſioners preſent.

Here the court ſit private.

Ordered, That the commitee for nominating the officers of this court, together with the commitee for nominating the guards, do conſider of an allowance for diet of the officers, and what other ſatisfaction they ſhall have for their ſervice.

Colonel Harvey informed the court, That he was deſired to ſignify, in behalf of mr. John Corbet, member of this court, that his abſenſe is not from any diſaffection to the proceedings of this court, but in regard of other eſpecial imployment which he hath in the ſervice of the ſtate.

Here the court conſidered of the King's carriage on the Saturday before, and of all had then paſſed on the court's behalf, and approved thereof, as agreeing to their ſenſe and directions. And perceiving what the King aimed at, viz. to bring in queſtion (if he could) the court's juriſdiction, and the authority whereby they ſat; and conſidering that he had not in the interim acknowledged them in any ſort to be a court, or in any judicial capacity to determine of his demand and plea, and that, thro' their ſides, he intended to wound (if he might be permited) the ſupreme authority of the commons of England, in their repreſentative, the commons aſſembled in parliament; after advice with their counſel learned in both laws, and mature deliberation had of the matter.

Reſolved, That the priſoner ſhould not be ſuffered to bring in queſtion theſe things which he aimed at, touching that higheſt juriſdiction; whereof they might not make themſelves judges, and from which there was no appeal. And therefore order and direct, viz.

Ordered, That in caſe the King ſhall again offer to fall into that diſcourſe, the lord-preſident do let him know, That the court have taken into conſideration his demands of the laſt day, and that he ought to reſt ſatisfied with this anſwer, "That the "commons of England aſſembled in parliament have conſti- "tuted this court, whoſe power may not nor ſhould be per- "mited to be diſputed by him, and that they were reſolved he "ſhould anſwer his charge."

That in caſe he ſhall refuſe to anſwer, or acknowledge the court, the lord-preſident do let him know, that the court will take it as a contumacy, and that it ſhall be ſo recorded.

That in caſe he ſhall offer to anſwer with a "Saving," notwithſtanding of his pretended prerogative, that the lord-preſident do, in name of the court, refuſe his proteſt, and require his poſitive anſwer to the charge.

That in caſe the King ſhall demand a copy of the charge, that he ſhall then declare his intention to anſwer; and that declaring ſuch his intention, a copy be granted unto him.

That in caſe the King ſhall ſtill perſiſt in his contempt, the lord-preſident do give command to the clerk to demand of the King, in name of the court, in theſe words following, viz.

"Charles Stuart, King of England, you are accuſed, in be- "half of the people of England, of diverſe high-crimes and "treaſons, which charge has been read unto you; the court "requires you to give a poſitive anſwer, whether you confeſs "or deny the charge; having determined, that you ought to "anſwer the ſame."

Ordered, That the commiſſioners ſhall be called in open court, at the court's ſiting in the hall, and that the names of ſuch appear ſhall be recorded.

Weſtminſter-hall, 22 January, 1648, poſt Merid.

The commiſſioners, coming from the Painted-chamber, took their place in the public court, in Weſtminſter-hall, as on Saturday before; and being ſat, and the hall-door ſet open, three proclamations were made for all perſons, who were adjourned over to this time, to give their attendance, and for all perſons to keep ſilence, on pain of impriſonment: the court was thereupon called.

Seventy commiſſioners preſent.

The court being called, the ſerjeant was commanded to fetch his priſoner.

The King again brought priſoner to the bar, as on Saturday before: proclamation made for ſilence, while pleas of the common-wealth were in hand; and order given to the captain of the guard to take into his cuſtody ſuch as ſhould diſturb the court.

Mr. ſollicitor moved the court, that the priſoner might give a poſitive anſwer to his charge, or otherwiſe that the court would take the matter of it "pro confeſſo," and proceed thereupon according to juſtice. Which being preſſed by the court upon the priſoner, and their judgment again made known to him, That he was to anſwer his charge, otherwiſe his contumacy would be recorded:

The priſoner, this notwithſtanding, ſtill inſiſted on his former plea, and that the court had no power, nor the commons of England who had conſtituted it, to proceed againſt him. Upon which the clerk of the court, by command, and according to former order, required his anſwer in the form preſcribed: and the priſoner ſtill refuſing to ſubmit thereto, his default and contempt were again recorded, the priſoner remanded, and the court adjourned 'till next day, being Tueſday, at twelve, to the Painted-chamber; withal, giving notice, that from thence they intended to adjourn to this place again.

[Sunday having paſſed in faſting and ſeditious preaching, according to the mode of theſe impious hypocrites, who uſed to preface rebellion and murder with the appearance of religion, the illuſtrious ſufferer was (as is before in Phelps's Journal related) placed before the infamous tribunal, where their mercenary ſollicitor, Cook, opened the tragic ſcene thus, diſplaying his talents of impudence and treaſon. Nalſon.]

COOK. May it pleaſe your lordſhip, my lord-preſident; I did at the laſt court, in behalf of the commons of England, exhibit and give into this court a charge of high-treaſon, and other high crimes againſt the priſoner at the bar, whereof I do accuſe him in name of the people of England: and the charge was read unto him, and his anſwer required. My lord; he was not pleaſed to give an anſwer, but inſtead of anſwering, did there diſpute the authority of this High-court. My humble motion to this High-court, in behalf of the kingdom of England, is, That the priſoner may be directed to make a poſitive anſwer, either by way of confeſſion or negation; which if he ſhall refuſe to do, that then the matter of charge may be taken "pro confeſſo," and the court may proceed according to juſtice.

BRADSHAW. Sir, you may remember, at the laſt court, you were told the occaſion of your being brought hither, and you heard a charge read againſt you, containing a charge of high-treaſon and other high crimes againſt this realm of England: you heard likewiſe, that it was prayed, in behalf of the people, that you ſhould give anſwer to this charge, that thereupon ſuch proceedings might be had as ſhould be agreeable to juſtice. You were then pleaſed to make ſome ſcruples concerning the authority of this court, and knew not by what authority you were brought hither; you did diverſe times propound your queſtions, and were as often anſwered, That it was by authority of the commons of England aſſembled in parliament, who did think fit to call you to account for thoſe high and capital miſdemeanors wherewith you were then charged. Since that, the court has taken into conſideration what you then ſaid; they are fully ſatisfied with their own authority, and they hold it fit that you ſhould be ſatisfied with it too; and they do require it, that you do give a poſitive and particular anſwer to this charge which is exhibited againſt you: they do expect you ſhould either confeſs or deny it; if you deny, it is offered, in behalf of the kingdom, to be made good againſt you: their authority they do avow to the whole world, that the whole kingdom are to reſt ſatisfied in, and you are to reſt ſatisfied with it: and therefore you are to loſe no more time, but to give a poſitive anſwer thereunto.

KING. When I was here laſt, it is very true, I made that queſtion; and, if it were only my own particular caſe, I would have ſatisfied myſelf with the proteſtation I made, the laſt time I was here, againſt the legality of this court, and that a King cannot be tried by any ſuperior juriſdiction on earth: but it is not my caſe alone, it is the freedom and the liberty of the people of England; and do you pretend what you will, I ſtand more for their liberties. For if power without law may make laws, may alter the fundamental laws of the kingdom, I do not know what ſubject he is in England who can be ſure of his life, or any thing which he calls his own: therefore when I came here, I did expect particular reaſons to know by what law, what authority you did proceed againſt me here. And therefore I am a little to ſeek what to ſay to you in this particular, becauſe the affirmative is to be proved, the negative often is very hard to do: but ſince I cannot perſuade you to do it, I ſhall tell you my reaſons as ſhort as I can.

My reaſons why, in conſcience and the duty I owe to God firſt, and my people next, for the preſervation of their lives, liberties and eſtates, I conceive I cannot anſwer this, 'till I be ſatisfied of the legality of it.

All proceedings againſt any man whatſoever——

BRADSHAW. Sir, I muſt interrupt you, which I would not do, but that what you do is not agreeable to the proceedings of any court of juſtice. You are about to enter into argument, and diſpute concerning the authority of this court, before whom you appear as a priſoner, and are charged as a high delinquent; if you take upon you to diſpute the authority of the court, we may not do it, nor will any court give way unto it: you are to ſubmit unto it, you are to give a punctual and direct anſwer, whether you will anſwer your charge or no, and what your anſwer is.

KING. Sir, by your favor, I do not know the forms of law; I do know law and reaſon, tho' I am no lawyer profeſſed, but I know as much law as any gentleman in England; and therefore (under favor) I do plead for the liberties of the people of England more than you do: and therefore, if I ſhould impoſe a belief upon any man, without reaſons given for it, it were unreaſonable; but I muſt tell you, that by that reaſon which I have, as thus informed, I cannot yield unto it.

BRADSHAW. Sir, I muſt interrupt you, you may not be permited: you ſpeak of law and reaſon, it is fit there ſhould be law and reaſon, and there is both againſt you. Sir, the vote of the commons of England aſſembled in parliament, it is the reaſon of the kingdom, and they are theſe too who have given that law, according to which you ſhould have ruled and reigned. Sir, you are not to diſpute our authority, you are told it again by the court. Sir, It will be taken notice of, that you ſtand in contempt of the court, and your contempt will be recorded accordingly.

KING. I do not know how a King can be a delinquent; but by any law which ever I heard of, all men (delinquents, or what you will) let me tell you they may put in demurrers againſt any proceeding as legal: and I do demand that, and demand to be heard with my reaſons; if you deny that, you deny reaſon.

BRADSHAW. Sir, you have offered ſomething to the court; I ſhall ſpeak ſomething unto you, the ſenſe of the court. Sir, neither you, nor any man, are permited to diſpute that point; you are concluded, you may not demur to the juriſdiction of the court: if you do, I muſt let you know, that they over-rule your demurrer; they ſit here by the authority of the commons of England, and all your predeceſſors and you are reſponſible to them.

KING. I deny that, ſhew me one precedent.

BRADSHAW. Sir, you ought not to interrupt while the court is ſpeaking to you. This point is not to be debated by you, neither will the court permit you to do it; if you offer it by way of demurrer to the juriſdiction of the court, they have conſidered of their juriſdiction, they do affirm their own juriſdiction.

KING. I ſay, ſir, by your favor, that the commons of England were never a court of judicature; I would know how they came to be ſo.

BRADSHAW. Sir, you are not to be permited to go on in that ſpeech and theſe diſcourſes.

Then the clerk of the court read,

"Charles Stuart, King of England, you have been accuſed "on the behalf of the people of England of high-treaſon, and

" and other high crimes; the court have determined that you " ought to anſwer the ſame."

KING. I will anſwer the ſame, ſo ſoon as I know by what authority you do this.

BRADSHAW. If this be all you will ſay, then gentlemen, you who brought the priſoner hither, take charge of him back again.

KING. I do require that I may give in my reaſons why I do not anſwer, and give me time for that.

BRADSHAW. Sir, it is not for priſoners to require.

KING. Priſoners! Sir, I am not an ordinary priſoner.

BRADSHAW. The court has conſidered of their juriſdiction, and they have already affirmed their juriſdiction; if you will not anſwer, we will give order to record your default.

KING. You never heard my reaſon yet.

BRADSHAW. Sir, your reaſons are not to be heard againſt the higheſt juriſdiction.

KING. Shew me that juriſdiction where reaſon is not to be heard.

BRADSHAW. Sir, we ſhew it you here, the commons of England; and the next time you are brought, you will know more of the pleaſure of the court; and, it may be, their final determination.

KING. Shew me where ever the houſe of commons was a court of judicature of that kind.

BRADSHAW. Serjeant, take away the priſoner.

KING. Well, ſir, remember that the King is not ſuffered to give in his reaſons for the liberty and freedom of all his ſubjects.

BRADSHAW. Sir, you are not to have liberty to uſe this language. How great a friend you have been to the laws and liberties of the people, let all England and the world judge.

KING. Sir, under favor, it was for the liberty, freedom and laws of the ſubject, that ever I took———defended myſelf with arms; I never took up arms againſt the people, but for the laws.

BRADSHAW. The command of the court muſt be obeyed; no anſwer will be given to the charge.

KING. Well, ſir!

Then Bradſhaw ordered the default to be recorded, and the contempt of the court; and that no anſwer would be given to the charge.

The King was guarded forth to ſir Robert Cotton's houſe.

The court adjourned to the Painted-chamber, on Tueſday at twelve, and from thence to Weſtminſter-hall; at which time all perſons concerned were to give their attendance.

[His majeſty, not being ſuffered to deliver his reaſons againſt the juriſdiction of their pretended court, by word of mouth, thought fit to leave them in writing, to the more impartial judgment of poſterity, as follows, viz.

" HAving already made my proteſtations, not only againſt " the illegality of this pretended court, but alſo, " That no earthly power can juſtly call me" (who am your " King) " in queſtion, as a delinquent;" I would not any " more open my mouth upon this occaſion, more than to re- " fer myſelf to what I have ſpoken, were I in this caſe alone " concerned: but the duty I owe to God, in the preſervation " of the true liberty of my people, will not ſuffer me at this " time to be ſilent. For how can any free-born ſubject of " England call life, or any thing he poſſeſſeth, his own, if " power without right daily make new, and abrogate the " old fundamental laws of the land, which I now take to be " the preſent caſe; Wherefore, when I came hither, I ex- " pected that you would have indeavored to have ſatisfied me " concerning theſe grounds which hinder me to anſwer to your " pretended impeachment: but ſince I ſee that nothing I can " ſay will move you to it (tho' negatives are not ſo naturally " proved as affirmatives) yet I will ſhew you the reaſon why " I am confident you cannot judge me, nor indeed the meaneſt " man in England: for I will not (like you) without ſhewing " a reaſon, ſeek to impoſe a belief upon my ſubjects.

" There is no proceeding juſt againſt any man, but what " is warranted either by God's laws, or the muni- " cipal laws of the country where he lives. Now " I am moſt confident, this day's proceeding " cannot be warranted by God's law; for, on " the contrary, the authority of obedience unto " Kings is clearly warranted, and ſtrictly com- " manded both in the Old and New Teſtament; " which, if denied, I am ready inſtantly to prove.

Hereabout I was ſtop'd and not ſuffered to ſpeak any more concerning reaſons.

" And for the queſtion now in hand, there it is ſaid, " That, " where the word of a King is, there is power; and " who may ſay unto him, what doſt thou?" Eccl. 8. 4. " Then for the law of this land, I am no leſs confident, that " no learned lawyer will affirm, That " an impeachment " can lie againſt the King, they all going in his name:" and " one of their maxims is, that " the King can do no wrong." " Beſides, the law upon which you ground your proceedings " muſt be either old or new; if old, ſhew it; if new, tell " what authority, warranted by the fundamental laws of the " land, hath made it, and when. But how the houſe of com- " mons can erect a court of judicature, which was never one " itſelf (as is well known to all lawyers) I leave to God and " the world to judge. And it were full as ſtrange, that " they ſhould pretend to make laws without King or lords " houſe, to any who have heard ſpeak of the laws of Eng- " land.

" And admiting, but not granting, that the people of " England's commiſſion could grant your " pretended power," " I ſee nothing you can ſhew for that; for certainly you never " asked the queſtion of the " tenth man" in the kingdom: " and in this way you manifeſtly wrong even the " pooreſt " ploughman," if you demand not his free conſent; nor can " you pretend any color for this your " pretended com- " miſſion," without the conſent at leaſt of the major part of " every man in England, of whatſoever quality or condition, " which I am ſure you never went about to ſeek; ſo far " are you from having it. Thus you ſee that I ſpeak not " for my own right alone, as I am your King, but alſo for " the true liberty of all " my ſubjects," which conſiſts not " in the " power of government," but in " living under " ſuch laws, ſuch a government," as may give themſelves " the beſt aſſurance of their lives, and property of their goods. " Nor in this muſt or do I forget the " privileges" of both " houſes of parliament, which this day's proceedings do not " only violate, but likewiſe occaſion the greateſt breach of " their public faith, was (I believe) ever heard of: with " which I am far from charging the two houſes; for all " pretended crimes" laid againſt me bear date long before " this treaty at Newport, in which I having concluded as " much as in me lay, and hopefully expecting the houſes " agreement thereunto, I was ſuddenly ſurpriſed, and hur- " ried from thence as a priſoner: upon which account I am " againſt my will brought hither; where ſince I am come, I " cannot but, to my power, defend the antient laws and liber- " ties of this kingdom, together with my own juſt right. " Then, for any thing I can ſee, the higher houſe is totally " excluded: and, for the houſe of commons, it is too well " known that the major part of them are detained, or de- " terred from ſiting; ſo as, if I had no other, this were ſuf- " ficient for me to proteſt againſt the lawfulneſs of your pre- " tended court. Beſide all this, the peace of the kingdom is " not the leaſt in my thoughts; and what hopes of ſetlement " is there, ſo long as power reigns without rule or law, " changing the whole frame of that government, under which " this kingdom hath flouriſhed for many hundred years? " (Nor will I ſay what will fall out, in caſe this lawleſs unjuſt " proceeding againſt me do go on.) And believe it, the " commons of England will not thank you for this change; " for they will remember how happy they have been of late " years under the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the King my " father, and myſelf, until the begining of theſe unhappy " troubles, and will have cauſe to doubt that they ſhall never " be ſo happy under any new. And by this time it will be " too ſenſibly evident, that the arms I took up were only to " defend the fundamental laws of this kingdom, againſt thoſe " who have ſuppoſed my power hath totally changed the an- " tient government.

" Thus having ſhewed you briefly the reaſons, why I can- " not ſubmit to your pretended authority, without violating " the truſt which I have from God, for the welfare and li- " berty of my people; I expect from you either clear reaſons " to convince my judgment, ſhewing me that I am in an " error (and then truly I will anſwer) or that you will with- " draw your proceeding."

This I intended to ſpeak in Weſtminſter-hall on Monday, January the 22d; but, againſt reaſon, was hindered to ſhew my reaſons.]

And taking into conſideration the proceeding of the laſt court the laſt day, fully approved of what, in their behalf, had been then ſaid and done; and likewiſe taking into conſideration the demeanor of the King at the ſaid court, have notwithſtanding reſolved to try him once more, whether he will own the court; and to that purpoſe,

Ordered, That the lord-preſident do acquaint the King, in caſe he ſhall continue contumacious, that he is to expect no farther time; and that the lord-preſident do therefore, in name of the court, require his poſitive and final anſwer; and if he ſhall ſtill perſiſt in his obſtinacy, that the lord-preſident give command to the clerk to read as follows, viz.

Nevertheleſs, if the King ſhould ſubmit to anſwer, and deſire a copy of his charge, that it be granted him by the lord-preſident; notwithſtanding giving him to know, That the court might in juſtice forthwith proceed to judgment for his former contumacy and failure to anſwer; and that he be required to give his anſwer to the ſaid charge, next day at one in the after-noon. Whereupon the court inſtantly adjourned to Weſtminſter-hall.

Seventy-one commiſſioners preſent.

The court being called, the ſerjeant was required to ſend for the priſoner, who was accordingly brought to the bar, where he took his ſeat as formerly. Proclamation was thereupon made for ſilence, while the pleas of the common-wealth were in hand, and the captain of the guard commanded, by proclamation, to take into cuſtody all who ſhould diſturb the proceedings of the court.

Mr. ſollicitor Cook, addreſſing himſelf to the court, repeated the former delays and contempts of the priſoner, ſo as that no more needed on his part, but to demand judgment; yet offered, notwithſtanding the notoriety of the facts charged, mentioned in the commons act appointing the trial, to prove the truth of the ſame by witneſſes, if thereto required: and therefore prayed, and yet (he ſaid) not ſo much he, as the innocent blood which had been ſhed, the cry whereof was very great, that a ſpeedy ſentence and judgment might be pronounced againſt the priſoner at the bar, according to juſtice.

Hereupon the court, puting the priſoner in mind of former proceedings, and that altho', by the rules of juſtice, if advantage was taken of his paſſed contempts, nothing would remain but to pronounce judgment againſt him, they had nevertheleſs determined to give him leave to anſwer his charge; which, as was told him in plain terms (for juſtice knew no reſpect of perſons) was to plead Guilty, or Not Guilty, thereto.

To which he made anſwer as formerly, That he would not acknowledge the juriſdiction of the court, and that it was againſt the fundamental laws of the kingdom; that there was no law to make a King a priſoner; that he had done nothing againſt his truſt; and iſſued out into ſuch-like diſcourſes.

Upon which the court's reſolution was again remembered to him, and he told; That he had now the third time publicly diſowned and affronted the court: that how good a preſerver he had been of the fundamental laws, and freedoms of the people, his actions had ſpoken: that mens intentions were uſed to be ſhewed by their actions, and that he had writen his meaning in bloody characters throughout the kingdom; and that he ſhould find at laſt, tho' at preſent he would not underſtand it, that he was before a court of juſtice.

Hereupon, in the manner appointed, the clerk, in name of the court, demanding the priſoner's anſwer to his charge, and the ſame refuſed, the default was recorded, the priſoner remanded, and the court adjourned to the Painted-chamber.

Painted-chamber.

The court, according to their former adjournment from Weſtminſter-hall, came together from thence into the Painted-chamber, where they ſat privately, and ordered as follows, viz.

Ordered, That no commiſſioner ought, or ſhall depart from the court, without the ſpecial leave of the ſaid court.

This court took into conſideration the managing of the buſineſs of the court this day, in the hall, and the King's refuſal to anſwer, notwithſtanding he had been three ſeveral times demanded and required thereunto; and thereupon fully approved of what, on the court's part, had then paſſed; and reſolved,

That, notwithſtanding the ſaid contumacy of the King, and refuſal to plead, which in law amounts to a ſtanding mute, and tacit confeſſion of the charge, and notwitſtanding the notoriety of the fact charged, the court would nevertheleſs however examine witneſſes, for the farther and clearer ſatisfaction of their own judgments and conſciences; the manner of whoſe examination was refered to farther conſideration the next ſiting, and warrants were accordingly iſſued forth for ſummoning witneſſes.

Mr. Peters moved the court, as a meſſenger from the King, viz. That the King deſires he might ſpeak with his chaplains, who came unto him privately: but the houſe of commons having taken that into their conſideration, the court conceived it not proper for them to intermedle therein.

The court adjourned 'till nine to-morrow morning, to this place.

" What paſſed in the hall more at large than is related by " Phelps, in this day's tranſactions, ſee in the following diſ- " courſe.

The

The King, being brought in by the guard, looked with a majeſtic countenance upon his pretended judges, and ſat down.

After the ſecond O Yes, and ſilence commanded, Cook began more inſolently:

COOK. May it pleaſe your lordſhip, my lord-preſident: this is now the third time, that, that by the great grace and favor of this High-court, the priſoner has been brought to the bar, before any iſſue joined in the cauſe. My lord, I did at the firſt court exhibit a charge againſt him, containing the higheſt treaſon was ever wrought upon the theater of England; that a King of England, truſted to keep the law, who had taken oath ſo to do, who had tribute paid him for that end, ſhould be guilty of a wicked deſign to ſubvert and deſtroy our laws, and introduce arbitrary and tyrannical government, in defiance of the parliament and their authority, ſet up his ſtandard for war againſt the parliament and people: and I did humbly pray, in behalf of the people of England, that he might ſpeedily be required to make anſwer to the charge.

But, my lord, inſtead of making any anſwer, he did then diſpute the authority of this High-court. Your lordſhip was pleaſed to give him a farther day to conſider, and to put in his anſwer; which day being yeſterday, I did humbly move, that he might be required to give a direct and poſitive anſwer, either by denying or confeſſion of it: but, my lord, he was then pleaſed to demur to the juriſdiction of the court; which the court did then over-rule, and command him to give a direct and poſitive anſwer. My lord; beſides this great delay of juſtice, I ſhall now humbly move your lordſhip for ſpeedy judgment againſt him. My lord, I might preſs your lordſhip upon the whole, that, according to the known rules of the law of the land, if a priſoner ſhall ſtand as contumacious in contempt, and ſhall not put in an iſſuable plea, Guilty, or Not Guilty of the charge given againſt him, whereby he may come to a fair trial; that as by an implicit confeſſion, it may be taken "pro confeſſo," as it has been done to thoſe who have deſerved more favor than the priſoner at the bar has done. But beſide, my lord, I ſhall humbly preſs your lordſhip upon the whole fact. The houſe of commons, the ſupreme authority and juriſdiction of this kingdom, have declared, that it is notorious, that the matter of the charge is true, as it is in truth, my lord, as clear as cryſtal, and as the ſun which ſhines at noon-day: which if your lordſhip and the court be not ſatisfied in, I have notwithſtanding, on the people of England's behalf, ſeveral witneſſes to produce. And therefore I do humbly pray (and yet I muſt confeſs it is not ſo much I, as the innocent blood which has been ſhed, the cry whereof is very great for juſtice and judgment; and therefore I do humbly pray) that ſpeedy judgment be pronounced againſt the priſoner at the bar.

Sir, you have heard what is moved by the counſel, on behalf of the kingdom, againſt you. Sir, you may well remember, and if you do not, the court cannot forget, what dilatory dealings the court has found at your hands. You were pleaſed to propound ſome queſtions; you have had our reſolution upon them. You were told over and over again, that the court did affirm their own juriſdiction; that it was not for you, nor any other man, to diſpute the juriſdiction of the ſupreme and higheſt authority of England, from which there is no appeal, and touching which there muſt be no diſpute: yet you did perſiſt in ſuch carriage, as you gave no manner of obedience, nor did you acknowledge any authority in them, nor the High-court which conſtituted this court of juſtice.

Sir, I muſt let you know, from the court, that they are very ſenſible of theſe delays of yours, and that they ought not, being thus authorized by the ſupreme court of England, to be thus trifled withal; and that they might, in juſtice; if they pleaſed, and according to the rules of juſtice, take advantage of theſe delays, and proceed to pronounce judgment againſt you: yet nevertheleſs they are pleaſed to give direction, and on their behalfs I do require you, that you make a poſitive anſwer unto this charge which is againſt you, ſir, in plain terms (for juſtice knows no reſpect of perſons) you are to give your poſitive and final anſwer, in plain Engliſh, whether you be guilty, or not guilty, of theſe treaſons laid to your charge.

The King, after a little pauſe, ſaid.

When I was here yeſterday, I did deſire to ſpeak for the liberties of the people of England; I was interrupted. I deſire to know yet, whether I may ſpeak freely, or not.

BRADSHAW. Sir, you have had the reſolution of the court upon the like queſtion the laſt day, and you were told that, having ſuch a charge of ſo high a nature againſt you, your work was, that you ought to acknowledge the juriſdiction of the court, and to anſwer to your charge. Sir; if you anſwer to your charge, which the court gives you leave now to do, tho' they might have taken the advantage of your contempt; yet if you be able to anſwer to your charge, when you have once anſwered, you ſhall be heard at large, make the beſt defenſe you can. But, ſir, I muſt let you know from the court, as their commands, that you are not to be permited to iſſue out into any other diſcourſes, 'till ſuch time as you have given a poſitive anſwer concerning the matter which is charged upon you.

KING. For the charge, I value it not a ruſh: it is the liberty of the people of England which I ſtand for. For me to acknowledge a new court which I never heard of before, I who am your King, who ſhould be an example to all the people of England for to uphold juſtice, to maintain the old laws! indeed I know not how to do it. You ſpake very well the firſt day I came here (on Saturday) of the obligations which I had laid upon me by God, to the maintenance of the liberties of my people: the ſame obligation you ſpeak of, I do acknowledge to God that I owe to him, and to my people, to defend as much as in me lies the ancient laws of the kingdom. Therefore, 'till I may know that this is not againſt the fundamental laws of the kingdom, by your favor, I can put in no particular anſwer. If you will give me time, I will ſhew you my reaſons, why I cannot do it, and this——

Here being interrupted, he ſaid,

By your favor, you ought not to interrupt me. How I came here I know not; there is no law for it to make your King your priſoner. I was in a treaty upon the public faith of the kingdom, which was the known——two houſes of houſes of parliament, which was the repreſentative of the kingdom; and when I had almoſt made an end of the treaty, then I was hurried away, and brought hither: and therefore---

BRADSHAW. Sir, you muſt know the pleaſure of the court.

KING. By your favor, ſir.

BRADSHAW. Nay, ſir, by your favor, you may not be permited to fall into thoſe diſcourſes; you appear as a delinquent; you have not acknowledged the authority of the court; the court craves it not of you: but once more they command you to give your poſitive anſwer——clerk, do your duty.

KING. Duty, ſir!

Clerk reads:

"Charles Stuart, King of England, you are accuſed, in behalf of the commons of England, of diverſe high crimes and treaſons; which charge has been read unto you. The court now requires you to give your poſitive and final anſwer, by way of confeſſion, or denial of the charge."

KING. Sir, I ſay again to you, ſo that I might give ſatisfaction to the people of England of the clearneſs of my proceeding, not by way of anſwer, nor in this way, but to ſatisfy them, that I have done nothing againſt that truſt which has been commited to me, I would do it: but to acknowledge a new court, againſt their privileges, to alter the fundamental laws of the kingdom, ſir, you muſt excuſe me.

BRADSHAW. Sir, this is the third time you have publicly diſowned this court, and put an affront upon it. How far you have preſerved the privileges of the people, your actions have ſpoke it: but truly, ſir, mens intentions ought to be known by their actions; you have writen your meaning in bloody characters throughout the whole kingdom. But, ſir, you underſtand the pleaſure of the court.——Clerk, record the default.——And gentlemen, you who took charge of the priſoner, take him back again.

KING. I will only ſay this one word more to you: if it were only my own particular, I would not ſay any more, nor interrupt you.

BRADSHAW. Sir, you have heard the pleaſure of the court, and you are (notwithſtanding you will not underſtand it) to find, that you are before a court of juſtice.

Then the King went forth with the guard; and proclamation was made, That all perſons who had then appeared, and had farther to do at the court, might depart into the Painted-chamber; to which place the court did forthwith adjourn, and intended to meet at Weſtminſter-hall, by ten next morning.

CRYER. God bleſs the kingdom of England.

Mercurii, 24 Jan. 1648. Painted-chamber.

THREE proclamations made.

Here the court ſat private.

The court ordered, That the marſhal-gen. of this army, or his deputy, do bring forthwith mr. Holder, priſoner at Whitehall, to the end that he may teſtify his knowledge of all ſuch matters as ſhall be propounded to him concerning the charge againſt the King.

Ordered, That the dean's houſe, in Weſtminſter-abbey, be provided and furniſhed for the lodging of the lord-preſident and his ſervants, guards and attendants; and a commitee appointed to take care hereof accordingly.

Mr. Henry Gouge and mr. William Cuthbert, witneſſes produced to the charge againſt the King, were ſworn and examined.

The witneſſes ſworn in open court, and after examined by the commitee appointed for that purpoſe, the twenty-fourth inſtant, were now in open court called, and their reſpective depoſitions read to them: who did avow their ſaid ſeveral depoſitions, and affirm what was ſo read unto them reſpectively was true, upon the oaths they had taken.

The court being informed, that major Fox, being of the guard attending the lord-preſident, is arreſted, and commited to the keeper of Ludgate;

Ordered, That the ſaid keeper do forthwith bring the ſaid major before this court, and attend this court in perſon himſelf.

Mr. Holder being brought before this court, according to the order of this day, and his oath tendered unto him, to give evidence to ſuch matters as ſhould be propounded to him concerning the charge againſt the King; the ſaid mr. Holder deſired to be ſpared from giving evidence againſt the King.

Whereupon, the commiſſioners, finding him already a priſoner, and perceiving that the queſtions intended to be aſked him tended to accuſe himſelf, thought fit to wave his examination, and remanded him (and accordingly did ſo) to the priſon from whence he was brought.

The depoſitions, taken "ut ſupra", are as follow, viz.

Jan. 25, 1648.

William Cuthbert, of Patrington, in * Holderneſs, gent. aged forty-two years, or thereabouts, ſworn and examined, ſays, That he, this deponent, living at Hull-bridge, near Beverley, in July, 1642, did then hear, that forces were raiſed, about three thouſand foot, for the King's guard, under ſir Robert Strickland.

* Holderneſs is in the county of York.

And this deponent farther ſays, That about the ſecond of July, 1642, he ſaw a troop of horſe come to Beverley, being the Lord's Day, about four or five in the after-noon, called the Prince's troop; mr. James Nelthrop being then major of the ſaid town.

And this deponent farther ſays, That he did ſee that afternoon the ſaid troop march from Beverley aforeſaid into Holderneſs, where they received ammunition brought them up by the river Humber.

And this deponent farther ſays, That the ſame night, being Sunday, there came about three hundred foot-ſoldiers (ſaid to be ſir Robert Strickland's regiment) under the command of lieutenant-col. Duncombe, and called the King's guard, unto this deponent's houſe, called Hull-bridge, near Beverley, about mid-night, and broke open, entered and poſſeſſed themſelves of the ſaid houſe; and that the earl of Newport, the earl of Carnarvan, and diverſe others, came that night thither to the ſaid forces: and that the ſame night (as this deponent was then informed) ſir Tho. Gower, then high-ſheriff of the ſaid county came thither, and left there a warrant for ſtaying all proviſions from going to Hull, to ſir John Hotham; which ſaid warrant was then delivered to this deponent, being conſtable, by lieut. col. Duncombe.

And this deponent farther ſays, That he was, by the ſaid forces, put out of his houſe, and did with his family go to Beverley; and that after that, viz. the Thurſday following, to this deponent's beſt remembrance, he did ſee the King come to Beverley, to lady Gee's houſe there; where he, this deponent, did often ſee the King, with Prince Charles and the duke of York: and that the trained bands were then raiſed in Holderneſs; who were raiſed (as was generally reported) by the King's command.

And this deponent farther ſays, That the night after the ſaid forces had, as aforeſaid, poſſeſſed themſelves of this deponent's houſe, col. Legard's houſe was plundered by them, being upon a Monday; which aforeſaid entry of this deponent's houſe, was the firſt * act of hoſtility commited in thoſe parts.

* Sir John Hotham's keeping Hull as a gariſon againſt the King, which was before this, was, it ſeems, no act of hoſtility, in this perjured villain's account. Nalſon.

And this deponent farther ſays, That after the ſaid ſir Robert Strickland's ſaid company was gone from Hull-bridge, having continued there about ten days, there then came to the ſaid houſe col. Wivel, with about ſeven hundred foot-ſoldiers, who then took up his quarters at Hull-bridge aforeſaid. And this deponent farther ſays, That the warrant he now produces to this court is the ſame original warrant aforeſaid ſpoken of.

And

And this deponent farther ſays, that the general's name of the ſaid forces which were there, and raiſed as aforeſaid, was the earl of Lindſey; and that this deponent was brought before him, the ſaid general, in the name of the King's lord general, for holding intelligence with ſir John Hotham, then governor of Hull: and becauſe it was then informed to the ſaid general, that he, this deponent, had proviſions of corn to ſend over to Ireland, which he, this deponent, was forbid by the ſaid general to ſend to Ireland, or any place elſe, without his or the King's direction or warrant firſt had in that behalf.

The aforeſaid warrant, mentioned in the depoſition of the ſaid William Cuthbert, is as follows: viz.

"IT is his Majeſty's command, that you do not ſuffer any victuals or proviſion, of what ſort ſoever, to be carried into the town of Hull, without his Majeſty's ſpecial licenſe firſt obtained. And of this you are not to fail, at your peril."

Dated at Beverley, 3 Julii, 1642.

Tho. Gower, Vi. Co.

To all head-conſtables and conſtables in the Eaſt-riding of the county of York, and to all other his Majeſty's loyal ſubjects.

And this deponent farther ſays; That he, this deponent, and the regiment of which he then was, had their colors then given them; and ſir William Penyman being colonel of the ſaid regiment, the ſaid ſir William Penyman was preſent with his ſaid regiment at that time.

And this deponent farther ſays, That there was then there the earl of Lindſey's regiment, who had then their colors given them, and that the ſaid earl of Lindſey was then alſo proclaimed there the King's general; and that it was proclaimed then there, likewiſe in the King's name, at the head of every regiment, that the ſaid forces ſhould fight againſt all who came to oppoſe the King, or any of his followers; and in particular againſt the earl of Eſſex, lord Brooke, and diverſe others: and that they, the ſaid earl of Eſſex, lord Brooke, and diverſe others, were then proclaimed traitors; and that the ſame proclamations were printed, and diſperſed by the officers of the regiments throughout every regiment.

And this deponent farther ſays; That the ſaid ſtandard was advanced upon the higheſt tower of Notingham-caſtle; and that he, this deponent, did ſee the King often in Notingham at the time when the ſaid forces continued at Notingham as aforeſaid, they continuing there for the ſpace of one month; and that the drums for raiſing volunteers, to fight under the King's command, were then beaten all the county over, and diverſe other forces were raiſed there.

And this deponent farther ſays, That he did take up arms under the King's command, as aforeſaid, for fear of being plundered; ſir William Penyman giving out, that it were a good deed to fire the ſaid town, becauſe they would not go forth in the King's ſervice: and that this deponent's father did thereupon command him, this deponent, to take up arms as aforeſaid, and that diverſe others (as they did confeſs) did then alſo take up arms for the King, for fear of being plundered.

* How is it poſſible this fellow could ſwear the King ſpoke this to every colonel, ſeeing it was as they paſſed by? and when his colonel was paſſed by, he could hear no more. Nalſon.

And this deponent ſays, That he did ſee many ſlain at the fight at Edge-hill, and that afterwards he did ſee a liſt brought in to Oxford, of the men who were ſlain in that fight; by which it was reported, that there were ſlain ſix thouſand five hundred and fifty nine men.

THOMAS READ, of Maidſtone in the county of Kent, gent. ſworn and examined, ſays, That preſently after the laying down of arms in Cornwall, between Leſtwithiel and Foy, in or about the latter end of the month of Auguſt, or the begining of September, 1644, he, this deponent, did ſee the King in the head of a guard of horſe.

JAMES CROSBY, of Dublin in Ireland, barber, ſworn and examined, ſays, That at the firſt fight at Newbury, about the time of barley-harveſt, 1643, he, this deponent, did ſee the King riding from Newbury-town, accompanied with diverſe lords and gentlemen, towards the place where his forces were then fighting with the parliament's army.

SAMUEL BURDON, of Lyneham in the county of Wilts, gent. ſworn and examined, ſays, That he, this deponent, was at Notingham in or about the month of Auguſt, 1642, at which time he ſaw a flag flying upon the tower of Notingham-caſtle; and that the next day afterwards he did ſee the King at Notingham, when the ſaid flag was ſtill flying; which flag this deponent then heard was the King's ſtandard.

He alſo ſays, That he did afterwards ſee the King at Cropredy-bridge in the head of his army, in a fallow-field there; and did ſee the King in purſuit of ſir William Waller's army, being then routed, which was about the month of July, 1644, and at that time this deponent did ſee many people ſlain upon the ground.

And farther this deponent ſays, That in or about the month of November, 1644, he did ſee the King at the laſt fight at Newbury, riding up and down the field, from regiment to regiment, while his army was there fighting with the parliament's forces; and this deponent did ſee many men ſlain at that battle, on both ſides.

MICHAEL POTTS, of Sharpereton in the county of Northumberland, vintner, ſworn and examined, depoſes, That he, this deponent, ſaw the King at the head of his army in the fields about a mile and a half from Newbury-town, upon the heath, the day before the fight was, it being about harveſt-tide, in the year 1643.

And he farther ſays, That he ſaw the King on the day after, when the fight was, ſtanding near a great piece of ordnance in the field.

And he farther ſays, That he ſaw the King in the ſecond Newbury-fight, at the head of his army, being after or about Michaelmas, 1644.

And he farther ſays, That he ſaw a great many men ſlain at both the ſaid battles.

And he farther ſays, That he ſaw the King at the head of his army near Cropredy-bridge, in the year 1644.

And he farther ſays, That he ſaw the King at the head of his army in Cornwall, near Leſtwithiel, while the earl of Eſſex lay there with his forces, about the middle of harveſt, 1644.

GEORGE CORNEWALL, of Aſton in the county of Hereford, ferry-man, aged fifty years, or thereabouts, ſworn and examined, ſays, That he, this deponent, did ſee the King near Cropredy-bridge, about the time of mowing of corn, 1644, in the van of the army there, and that he drew up his army upon a hill, and faced the parliament's army; and that there was thereupon a ſkirmiſh between the King's and the parliament's armies, where he, this deponent, ſaw diverſe perſons ſlain on both ſides.

"The examination of HENRY GOOCHE, of Gray's-Inn, "in the county of Middleſex, gent. ſworn and examined."

This deponent ſays, That on or about the thirtieth day of September laſt, he, this deponent, was in the Iſle of Wight, and had acceſs unto and diſcourſe with the King, by the means of the lord marquis of Hertford and commiſſary Morgan: where this deponent told the King, That his Majeſty had many friends; and that ſince his Majeſty was pleaſed to juſtify the parliament's firſt taking up arms, the moſt of the Preſbyterian party, both ſoldiers and others, would ſtick cloſe to him. To which the King anſwered thus; That he would have all his old friends know, that tho' for the preſent he was contented to give the parliament leave to call their own war what they pleaſed, yet that he neither did at that time, nor ever ſhould decline the juſtice of his own cauſe.

And this deponent told the King, That his buſineſs was much retarded, and that neither col. Thomas, nor any other, could proceed to action, thro' want of commiſſion.

The King anſwered, That he, being upon a treaty, would not diſhonor himſelf; but that if he, this deponent, would take the pains to go over to the Prince, his ſon (who had full authority from him) he the ſaid deponent, or any for him, ſhould receive whatſoever commiſſions ſhould be deſired; and to that purpoſe he would appoint the marquis of Hertford to write to his ſon in his name: and was pleaſed to expreſs much joy and affection, that his good ſubjects would ingage themſelves for his reſtauration.

ROBERT WILLIAMS, of the pariſh of St. Martins in the county of Cornwall, huſbandman, aged twenty three years, or thereabouts, ſworn and examined, ſays, That he, this deponent, did ſee the King marching in the head of his army about September, 1644, a mile from Leſtwithiel in Cornwall, in armor, with a ſhort coat over it unbuttoned.

And this deponent farther ſays, That he ſaw him after that, in St. Auſtell-downs, drawing up his army.

And this deponent ſays, He did after that ſee the King at the head of his army near Foy, and that the earl of Eſſex and his army did then lie within one mile and a half of the King's army.

The witneſſes being examined as aforeſaid, the court adjourned for an hour.

RICHARD PRICE, of London, ſcrivener, was produced a witneſs to the charge againſt the King; who, being ſworn and examined, ſaid,

That, upon occaſion of ſome tampering by the King's agents with the Independents, in and about London, to draw them from the parliament's cauſe to the King's party; and this being diſcovered by ſome of thoſe ſo tampered with to ſundry members of the commitee of ſafety, who directed a carrying on of a ſeeming compliance with the King; he, this deponent, did travel to Oxford in January, 1643, having a ſafe-conduct under the King's hand and ſeal, which he, this deponent, knows to be ſo; for that the King did own it, when he was told that this deponent was the man who came to Oxon with that ſafe-conduct.

And this deponent alſo ſays, that after ſundry meetings between him and the earl of Briſtol, about drawing the Independents to the King's cauſe againſt the parliament, the ſubſtance of the diſcourſe at which meetings (the ſaid earl told this deponent) was communicated to the King; he, this deponent, was by the ſaid earl brought to the King to confer farther about that buſineſs; where the King declared, that he was very ſenſible that the Independents had been the moſt active men in the kingdom for the parliament againſt him: and thereupon perſuaded this deponent to uſe all means to expedite their turning to him and his cauſe. And for their better incouragement, the King promiſed, on the word of a King, That if they, the Independents, would turn to him, and be active for him againſt the parliament, as they had been active for them againſt him, then he would grant them whatſoever freedom they would deſire. And the King did then refer this deponent to the earl of Briſtol, for the farther proſecuting of the ſaid buſineſs.

And the ſaid earl thereupon (this deponent being withdrawn from the King) did declare to this deponent, and willed him to impart the ſame to the Independents for their better incouragement; That the King's affairs proſpered well in Ireland; that the Iriſh ſubjects had given the rebels (meaning the parliament's forces) a great defeat; that the King had ſent lord Byron with a ſmall party towards Cheſhire, and that he was greatly multiplied, and had a conſiderable army, and was then before Namptwich, and would be ſtrengthened with more ſoldiers out of Ireland, which were coming and expected daily. And when this deponent was to depart from Oxford, four ſafe-conducts with blanks in them, for the inſerting of what names this deponent pleaſed, were delivered to him, under the King's hand and ſeal. And one Ogle was ſent out of Oxon with this deponent, to treat about delivering up Ailſbury to the King, it being then a gariſon for the parliament, and at the ſame time Oxford was a gariſon for the King.

Several papers and letters of the King's, under his own hand, and of his own writing, and other papers were produced, and read in open court.

Mr. Thomas Challoner alſo reported ſeveral papers and letters of the King's writing, and under the King's own hand.

After which the court ſat private.

The court, taking into conſideration the whole matter in charge againſt the King, paſſed theſe votes following, as preparatory to the ſentence againſt the King; but ordered that they ſhould not be binding finally to conclude the court, viz.

Reſolved, upon the whole matter, That this court will proceed to ſentence of condemnation againſt Charles Stuart, King of England.

Reſolved, &c. That the condemnation of the King ſhall be for a Tyrant, Traitor, and Murderer.

That the condemnation of the King ſhall be likewiſe for being a public enemy to the common-wealth of England.

That this condemnation ſhall extend to death.

Memorandum, The laſt mentioned commiſſioners were preſent at theſe votes.

The court being then moved concerning the depoſition and deprivation of the King before, and in order to that part of his ſentence which concerned his execution, thought fit to defer the conſideration thereof to ſome other time; and ordered the draught of a ſentence, grounded upon the ſaid votes, to be accordingly prepared by mr. Scot, mr. Martin, col. Harriſon, mr. Liſle, mr. Say, commiſſary-general Ireton and mr. Love, or any three of them, with a blank for the manner of his death.

Ordered, that the members of this court, who are in or about London, and are not now preſent, be ſummoned to attend the ſervice of this court to-morrow at one in the after-noon: for whom ſummons were iſſued forth accordingly.

The court adjourned 'till the morrow at one in the after-noon.

The ſentence agreed on, and ordered by this court, the twenty-ſixth inſtant, to be ingroſſed, being accordingly ingroſſed, was read.

Reſolved, that the ſentence now read, ſhall be the ſentence of this court for condemnation of the King, which ſhall be read and publiſhed in Weſtminſter-hall this day.

The court hereupon conſidered of certain inſtructions for the lord-lord-preſident, to manage the buſineſs of this day in Weſtminſter-hall; and ordered,

That the lord-preſident do manage what diſcourſe ſhall happen between him and the King, according to his diſcretion, with the adviſe of his two aſſiſtants: and that in caſe the King ſhall ſtill perſiſt in excepting againſt the court's juriſdiction, to let him know, that the court do ſtill affirm their juriſdiction.

That, in caſe the King ſhall ſubmit to the juriſdiction of the court, and pray a copy of the charge, that then the cour do withdraw and adviſe.

And thereupon it being farther moved, Whether the lord-preſident ſhould uſe any diſcourſe or ſpeeches to the King, as, in the caſe of other priſoners to be condemned, was uſual before publiſhing the ſentence, he received general directions to do therein as he ſhould ſee cauſe, and to preſs what he ſhould conceive moſt ſeaſonable and ſuitable to the occaſion. And it was farther directed, That, after reading the ſentence, the lord-preſident ſhould declare, That the ſame was the ſentence, judgment and reſolution of the whole court, and that the commiſſioners ſhould thereupon ſignify their conſent by ſtanding up.

The court forthwith adjourned to Weſtminſter-hall.

Sixty ſeven Commiſſioners preſent.

The priſoner brought to the bar, and proclamation again (as formerly) made for ſilence; and the captain of the guard ordered to take into his cuſtody all ſuch as ſhould diſturb the court.

The preſident ſtood up with intention of addreſs to the people, and not to the priſoner, who had ſo often declined the juriſdiction of the court; which the priſoner obſerving, moved he might be heard before judgment given: whereof he received aſſurance from the court, and that he ſhould be heard after he had heard them firſt.

Whereupon the court proceeded, and remembered the great aſſembly, then preſent, of what had formerly paſſed betwixt the court and the priſoner; the charge againſt him in the name of the people of England exhibited to them, being a court conſtituted by the ſupreme authority of England; his refuſal three ſeveral days and times to own them as a court, or to anſwer to the matter of his charge; his thrice recorded contumacy, and other his contempts and defaults in the precedent courts. Upon which the court then declared, That they might not be wanting to themſelves, or to the truſt repoſed in them; and that no man's wilfulneſs ought to ſerve him to prevent juſtice; and that they had therefore thought fit to take the ſubſtance of what had paſſed into their ſerious conſideration, to wit, the charge and the priſoner's contumacy, and the confeſſion which in the law doth ariſe upon that contumacy, the notoriety of the fact charged and other the circumſtances material in the cauſe: and upon the whole matter, had reſolved and agreed upon a ſentence then ready to be pronounced againſt the priſoner. But that, in regard of his deſire to be farther heard, they were ready to hear him as to any thing material, which he would offer to their conſideration before the ſentence given, relating to the defenſe of himſelf, concerning the matter charged; and did then ſignify ſo much to the priſoner: who made uſe of that leave given only to proteſt his reſpects to the peace of the kingdom, and liberty of the ſubject, and to ſay, That the ſame made him at laſt to deſire that, having ſomewhat to ſay which concerned both, he might before the ſentence given be heard in the Painted-chamber before the lords and commons; ſaying, It was fit to be heard, if it were reaſon which he ſhould offer, whereof they were judges. And preſſing that point much, he was forthwith anſwered by the court and told,

That, what he moved was a declining of the juriſdiction of the court, whereof he had caution frequently given him.

That it tended to farther delay, of which he had been too much guilty.

That the court being founded (as often had been ſaid) upon the authority of the commons of England, in whom reſted the ſupreme juriſdiction, the motion tended to ſet up another, or a co-ordinate juriſdiction, in derogation of the power whereby the court ſat, and to the manifeſt delay of their juſtice; in which regard, he was told, they might forthwith proceed to ſentence. Yet, for his farther ſatisfaction of the intire pleaſure and judgment of the court upon what he had then ſaid, he was told, and accordingly it was declared, That the court would withdraw half an hour.

The priſoner by command being withdrawn, the court make their receſs into the room called the Court of Wards, conſidered of the priſoner's motion, and gave the preſident direction to declare their diſſent thereto, and to proceed to the ſentence.

The court being again ſet, and the priſoner returned, was, according to their direction, informed, That he had in effect received his anſwer before the court withdrew; and that their judgment was (as to his motion) the ſame to him before declared; that the court acted, and were judges, appointed by the higheſt authority; and that judges were not to delay, no more than to deny juſtice: that they were good words in the great old charter of England, "Nulli negabimus, nulli vende-"mus, nulli differemus Juſtitiam vel Rectum:" that their duty called upon them to avoid farther delays, and to proceed to judgment; which was their unanimous reſolution.

To which the priſoner replied, and inſiſted upon his former deſires, confeſſing a delay; but that it was important for the peace of the kingdom: and therefore preſſed again with much earneſtneſs to be heard before the lords and commons.

In anſwer whereto, he was told by the court; That they had before fully conſidered of his propoſal, and muſt give him the ſame anſwer to his renewed deſires; and that they were ready to proceed to ſentence, if he had nothing more to ſay.

Whereunto he ſubjoined, he had no more to ſay; but deſired that what he had ſaid might be entered.

Hereupon, after ſome diſcourſe uſed by the preſident, for vindicating the parliament's juſtice, explaining the nature of the crimes of which the priſoner ſtood charged, and for which he was to be condemned; and by way of exhortation to the priſoner to a ſerious repentance for his high tranſgreſſions againſt God and the people, and to prepare for his eternal condition.

The ſentence formerly agreed upon, and put down in parchment-writing, O Yes being firſt made for ſilence, was, by the court's command, ſolemnly pronounced and given. The tenor whereof here follows:

"WHEREAS the commons of England, aſſembled "in parliament, have, by their late act, intitled, "An "Act of the Commons of England, aſſembled in Parliament, "for erecting a High-court of Juſtice for the trying and judg-"ing of Charles Stuart, King of England," authoriſed and con-"ſtituted us a High-court of Juſtice for the trying and judg-"ing of the ſaid Charles Stuart for the crimes and treaſons in "the ſaid act mentioned. By virtue whereof, the ſaid Charles "Stuart

" Stuart has been three ſeveral times convented before this " High-court; where the firſt day, being Saturday the " twentieth of January inſtant, in purſuance of the ſaid act, a " charge of high-treaſon, and other high crimes, was, in be- " half of the people of England, exhibited againſt him, and " read openly unto him; wherein he was charged, That he, " the ſaid Charles Stuart, being admited King of England, and " therein truſted with a limited power to govern by and ac- " cording to the law of the land, and not otherwiſe; and, by " his truſt, oath and office, being obliged to uſe the power " commited to him, for the good and benefit of the people, " and for the preſervation of their rights and liberties; yet ne- " vertheleſs, out of a wicked deſign to erect and uphold in him- " ſelf unlimited and tyrannical power to rule according to his " will, and to overthrow the rights and liberties of the people, " and to take away and make void the foundations thereof, and " of all redreſs and remedy of miſgovernment, which, by the " fundamental conſtitutions of this kingdom, were reſerved, on " the peoples behalf, in the right and power of frequent and " ſucceſſive parliaments, or national meetings in council, he, the " ſaid Charles Stuart, for accompliſhment of ſuch his deſigns, " and for the protecting of himſelf and his adherents in his and " their wicked practiſes, to the ſame end, has traitorouſly and " maliciouſly levied war againſt the preſent parliament, and " people therein repreſented, as, with the circumſtances of time " and place, is in the ſaid charge more particularly ſet forth: " and that he has thereby cauſed and procured many thouſands " of the free people of this nation to be ſlain; and by diviſions, " parties and inſurrections within this land, by invaſions from " foreign parts, indeavored and procured by him, and by many " other evil ways and means, he, the ſaid Charles Stuart, has " not only maintained and carried on the ſaid war both by ſea " and land, but alſo has renewed, or cauſed to be renewed " the ſaid war againſt the parliament and good people of this " nation, in this preſent year 1648, in ſeveral counties and " places within this kingdom, in the charge ſpecified; and that " he has for that purpoſe given his commiſſion to his ſon the " Prince, and others, whereby, beſide multitudes of other " perſons, many ſuch as were, by the parliament, intruſted " and imployed for the ſafety of this nation being, by him " or his agents, corrupted, to the betraying of their truſt, " and revolting from the parliament, have had entertain- " ment and commiſſion for the continuing and renewing of " the war and hoſtility againſt the ſaid parliament and people. " And that, by the ſaid cruel and unnatural war ſo levied, " continued and renewed, much innocent blood of the free " people of this nation hath been ſpiled, many families undone, " the public treaſure waſted, trade obſtructed and miſerably " decayed, vaſt expenſe and damage to the nation incurred, " and many parts of the land ſpoiled, ſome of them even to " deſolation. And that he ſtill continues his commiſſion to " his ſaid ſon, and other rebels and revolters, both Engliſh and " foreigners, and to the earl of Ormond, and to the Iriſh " rebels and revolters aſſociated with him, from whom farther " invaſions upon this land are threatened by his procurement, " and on his behalf: and that all the ſaid wicked deſigns, " wars and evil practiſes, of him, the ſaid Charles Stuart, " were ſtill carried on for the advancement and upholding of " the perſonal intereſt of will, power and pretended preroga- " tive to himſelf and his family, againſt the public intereſt, " common right, liberty, juſtice and peace of the people of " this nation. And that he thereby has been, and is the occa- " ſioner, author and contriver of the ſaid unnatural, cruel and " bloody wars, and therein guilty of all the treaſons, murders, " rapines, burnings, ſpoils, deſolations, damage and miſchief " to this nation, acted and commited in the ſaid wars, or occa- " ſioned thereby. Whereupon the proceedings and judgment of " this court were prayed againſt him as a tyrant, traitor, and " murderer, and public enemy to the common-wealth, as by " the ſaid charge more fully appears. To which charge, " being read unto him as aforeſaid, he, the ſaid Charles " Stuart, was required to give his anſwer: but he refuſed ſo " to do. And upon Monday, the twenty-ſecond day of " January inſtant, being again brought before this court, and " there required to anſwer directly to the ſaid charge, he ſtill " refuſed ſo to do: whereupon his default and contumacy were " entered. And the next day, being the third time brought " before the court, judgment was then prayed againſt him on " behalf of the people of England for his contumacy, and for " the matters contained againſt him in the ſaid charge, as " taking the ſame for confeſſed, in regard of his refuſing to " anſwer thereto. Yet notwithſtanding, this court (not willing " to take advantage of his contempt) did once more require " him to anſwer to the ſaid charge; but he again refuſed ſo to " do. Upon which his ſeveral defaults, this court might juſtly " have proceeded to judgment againſt him, both for his con- " tumacy and the matters of the charge, taking the ſame for " confeſſed, as aforeſaid.

" Yet nevertheleſs this court, for their own clearer infor- " mation, and farther ſatisfaction, have thought fit to " examine witneſſes upon oath, and take notice of other " evidences touching the matters contained in the ſaid charge, " which accordingly they have done.

" Now therefore, upon ſerious and mature deliberation of the " premiſes, and conſideration had of the notoriety of the mat- " ters of fact charged upon him, as aforeſaid, this court is, in " judgment and conſcience, ſatisfied that he, the ſaid Charles " Stuart, is guilty of levying war againſt the ſaid parliament " and people, and maintaining and continuing the ſame; for " which in the ſaid charge he ſtands accuſed, and by the ge- " neral courſe of his government, counſels, and practiſes, " before and ſince this parliament began (which have been and " are notorious and public, and the effects whereof remain " abundantly upon record) this court is fully ſatisfied in their " judgments and conſciences, that he has been and is guilty of " the wicked deſigns and indeavors in the ſaid charge ſet " forth; and that the ſaid war has been levied, maintained " and continued by him, as aforeſaid, in proſecution and for " accompliſhment of the ſaid deſigns: and that he has been " and is the occaſioner, author and continuer of the ſaid unna- " tural, cruel and bloody wars, and therein guilty of high- " treaſon, and of the murders, rapines, burnings, ſpoils, de- " ſolations, damages and miſchief to this nation, acted and " commited in the ſaid war, and occaſioned thereby. For all " which treaſons and crimes this court does adjudge, that he, " the ſaid Charles Stuart, as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and " public enemy to the good people of this nation, ſhall be put " to death, by the ſevering his head from his body."

This ſentence being read, the preſident ſaid thus; viz.

Whereupon the whole court ſtood up, and owned it.

The priſoner being withdrawn, the court adjourned forth- with into the Painted-chamber.

The court being ſat in the Painted-chamber, according to adjournment from Weſtminſter-hall, aforeſaid:

Sixty-four commiſſioners preſent.

Sir Hardreſs Waller, colonel Harriſon, commiſſary-general Ireton, colonel Deane, and colonel Okey, were appointed to conſider of the time and place for execution of the ſentence againſt the King.

And then the court adjourned 'till Monday-morning, at eight to this place.

[The more full account of this day's action, take as follows:

THE King being come in, in his wonted poſture, with his hat on, ſome of the ſoldiers began to call for Juſtice, Juſtice, Juſtice, and Execution. But ſilence being commanded, his Majeſty began:

KING. I deſire a word to be heard a little, and I hope I ſhall give no occaſion of interruption.

BRADSHAW. You may anſwer in your time, hear the court firſt.

KING. If it pleaſe you, ſir, I deſire to he heard, and I ſhall not give any occaſion of interruption, and it is only in a word. A ſudden judgment———

BRADSHAW. Sir, you ſhall be heard in due time, but you are to hear the court firſt.

KING. Sir, I deſire, it will be in order to what I believe the court will ſay; and therefore, ſir, a haſty judgment is not ſo ſoon recalled.

BRADSHAW. Sir, you ſhall be heard before the judgment be given, and in the mean time you may forbear.

KING, Well, ſir; ſhall I be heard before the judgment be given?

BRADSHAW. Gentlemen, it is well known to all, or moſt of you here preſent, that the priſoner at the bar has been ſeveral times convened and brought before this court to make anſwer to a charge of treaſon, and other high crimes, exhibited againſt him in the name of the people of * England; to which charge being required to anſwer, he has been ſo far from obeying the commands of the court, by ſubmiting to their juſtice, as he began to take upon him to offer reaſoning and debate unto the authority of the court, and of the higheſt court which conſtituted them to try and judge him: but being over-ruled in that, and required to make his anſwer, he was ſtill pleaſed to continue contumacious, and to reſuſe ſubmiting to anſwer. Hereupon the court, that they might not be wanting to themſelves, to the truſt repoſed in them, nor that any man's wilfulneſs prevent juſtice, have thought fit to take the matter into their conſideration: they have conſidered of the charge, they have conſidered of the contumacy, and of that confeſſion which in law does ariſe upon that contumacy: they have likewiſe conſidered of the notoriety of the fact charged upon this priſoner, and upon the whole matter, they are reſolved, and are agreed upon a ſentence to be pronounced againſt this priſoner. But, in reſpect he does deſire to be heard, before the ſentence be read and pronounced, the court has reſolved that they will hear him. Yet, ſir, thus much I muſt tell you before-hand, which you have been minded of at other courts, that if what you have to ſay, be to offer any debate concerning our juriſdiction, you are not to be heard in it; you have offered it formerly, and you have ſtruck at the root, that is, the power and ſupreme authority of the commons of England, which this court will not admit a debate of; and which indeed is an irrational thing in them to do, being a court which acts upon authority derived from them. But, ſir, if you have any thing to ſay in defenſe of yourſelf concerning the matter charged, the court has given me in command to let you know, they will hear you.

* Here a lady interpoſed, ſaying, "Not half "the people;" but was ſilenced with threats.

KING. Since I ſee that you will not hear any thing of debate concerning that which, I confeſs, I thought moſt material for the peace of the kingdom, and for the liberty of the ſubject, I ſhall wave it; I ſhall ſpeak nothing to it; but only I muſt tell you, that this many a-day all things have been taken away from me, but that which I call more dear to me than my life, which is my conſcience and my honor: and if I had a reſpect to my life more than the peace of the kingdom, and the liberty of the ſubject, certainly I ſhould have made a particular defenſe for myſelf; for by that at leaſtwiſe I might have delayed an ugly ſentence, which I believe will paſs upon me. Therefore, certainly, ſir, as a man who has ſome underſtanding, ſome knowledge of the world, if that my true zeal to my country had not over-borne the care I have for my own preſervation, I ſhould have gone another way to work than that I have done. Now, ſir, I conceive, that a haſty ſentence once paſſed, may ſooner be repented of, than recalled; and truly, the ſelf-ſame deſire which I have for the peace of the kingdom, and the liberty of the ſubject, more than my own particular ends, makes me now at laſt deſire, that I have ſomething * to ſay which concerns both, before ſentence be given, that I may be heard in the Painted-chamber before the lords and commons. This delay cannot be prejudicial to you, whatſoever I ſay; if that I ſay no reaſon, thoſe who hear me muſt be judges; I cannot be judge of that which I have: if it be reaſon, and really for the welfare of the kingdom, and the liberty of the ſubject, I am ſure of it, it is very well worth the hearing: therefore I do conjure you, as you love what you pretend, I hope it is real, the liberty of the ſubject, the peace of the kingdom, that you will grant me this hearing before any ſentence be paſſed. I only deſire this, that you will take this into your conſideration; it may be you have not heard of it before-hand: if you will, I will retire, and you may think of it: but if I cannot get this liberty, I do proteſt, that theſe fair ſhews of liberty and peace are pure ſhews, and that you will not hear your King.

BRADSHAW. Sir, you have now ſpoken.

KING. Yes, ſir.

BRADSHAW. And this which you have ſaid is a farther declining of the juriſdiction of this court, which was the thing wherein you were limited before.

KING. Pray excuſe me, ſir, for my interruption, becauſe you miſtake me; it is not a declining of it, you do judge me before you hear me ſpeak: I ſay it will not, I do not decline it, tho' I cannot acknowledge the juriſdiction of the court; yet, ſir, in this give me leave to ſay, I would do it, tho' I did not acknowledge it: in this I do proteſt it is not the declining of it, ſince I ſay, if that I do ſay any thing, but that which is for the peace of the kingdom, and the liberty of the ſubject, then the ſhame is mine. Now I deſire that you will take this into your conſideration; if you will, I will withdraw.

BRADSHAW. Sir, this is not altogether new which you have moved to us, not altogether new to us, tho' the firſt time in perſon you have offered it to the court. Sir, you ſay you do not decline the juriſdiction of the court.

KING. Not in this which I have ſaid.

BRADSHAW. I underſtand you well, Sir, but nevertheleſs that which you have offered, ſeems to be contrary to that ſaying of yours; for the court are ready to give a ſentence. It is not as you ſay, That they will not hear their King; for they have been ready to hear you: they have patiently waited your pleaſure for three courts together, to hear what you would ſay to the peoples charge againſt you, to which you have not vouchſafed to give any anſwer at all. Sir, this tends to a farther delay: truly, ſir, ſuch delays as theſe, neither may the kingdom, nor juſtice well bear: you have had three ſeveral days to have offered in this kind what you would have pleaſed. This court is founded upon that authority of the commons of England, in whom reſts the ſupreme juriſdiction; that which you now tender, is to have another juriſdiction, and a co-ordinate juriſdiction. I know very well you expreſs yourſelf, ſir, that notwithſtanding what you would offer to the lords and commons in the Painted-chamber, yet nevertheleſs you would proceed on here; I did hear you ſay ſo. But, ſir, that you would offer there, whatever it is, muſt needs be in delay of the juſtice here; ſo as if this court be reſolved, and prepared for the ſentence, this which you offer they are not bound to grant. But, ſir, according to that you ſeem to deſire, and becauſe you ſhall know the farther pleaſure of the court upon that which you have moved, the court will withdraw for a time.

[This he did, to prevent the diſturbance of their ſcene by one of their own members, col. John Downes, who could not ſtifle the reluctance of his conſcience, when he ſaw his Majeſty preſs ſo earneſtly for a ſhort hearing; but, declaring himſelf unſatisfied, forced them to yield to the King's requeſt. Nalſon.]

KING. Shall I withdraw?

BRADSHAW. Sir, you ſhall know the pleaſure of the court preſently.

The court withdraws, for half and hour, into the court of wards.

Serjeant at arms, the court gives command, that the priſoner be withdrawn; and they give order for his return again.

[Then withdrawing into the chamber of the court of wards, their buſineſs was not to conſider of his Majeſty's deſire, but to chide Downes, and with reproaches and threats to harden him to go thro' the remainder of their villany with them. Nalſon.]

Which done, they return: and being ſat, Bradſhaw commanded;

Serjeant at arms, ſend for your priſoner.

* Some have thought this was a propoſal of renouncing the crown in favor of his eldeſt ſon.

Who being come, Bradſhaw proceeded:

Sir, you were pleaſed to make a motion here to the court, to offer a deſire of yours, touching the propounding of ſomewhat to the lords and commons in the Painted-chamber, for the peace of the kingdom. Sir, you did, in effect, receive an anſwer before the court adjourned; truly, ſir, their withdrawing and adjournment was "pro formâ tantum;" for it did not ſeem to them, that there was any difficulty in the thing; they have conſidered of what you have moved, and have conſidered of their own authority, which is founded, as has been often ſaid, upon the ſupreme authority of the commons of England aſſembled in parliament: the court acts according to their commiſſion. Sir, the return I have to you from the court, is this: that they have been too much delayed by you already, and this which you now offer has occaſioned ſome little farther delay; and they are judges appointed by the higheſt authority; and judges are no more to delay, than they are to deny juſtice: they are good words in the great old charter of England; "Null negabimus, nulli vendemus, "nulli differemus Juſtitiam." There muſt be no delay; but the truth is, ſir, and ſo every man here obſerves it, that you have much delayed them in your contempt and default, for which they might long ſince have proceeded to judgment againſt you; and notwithſtanding what you have offered, they are reſolved to proceed to puniſhment, and to judgment, and that is their unanimous reſolution.

KING. Sir, I know it is in vain for me to diſpute; I am no Sceptic for to deny the power which you have; I know that you have power enough: ſir, I muſt confeſs, I think it would have been for the kingdom's peace, if you would have taken the pains to have ſhewn the lawfulneſs of your power; for this delay which I have deſired, I confeſs it is a delay, but it is a delay very important for the peace of the kingdom; for it is not my perſon which I look at alone, it is the kingdom's welfare, and the kingdom's peace; it is an old ſentence, That we ſhould think on long before we reſolve of great matters ſuddenly. Therefore, ſir, I do ſay again, that I do put at your doors all the inconveniency of a haſty ſentence. I confeſs I have been here now, I think, this week; this day eight days was the day I came here firſt, but a little delay of a day or two farther may give peace; whereas a haſty judgment may bring on that trouble and perpetual inconveniency to the kingdom, that the child which is unborn may repent it: and therefore again, out of the duty I owe to God, and to my country, I do deſire that I may be heard by the lords and commons in the Painted-chamber, or any other chamber which you will appoint me.

BRADSHAW. Sir, you have been already anſwered to what you even now moved, being the ſame you moved before ſince the reſolution and the judgment of the court in it: and the court now requires to know, whether you have any more to ſay for yourſelf than you have ſaid, before they proceed to ſentence.

KING. I ſay this, ſir, That if you hear me, if you will give me but this delay, I doubt not but I ſhall [give ſome ſatisfaction to you all here, and to my people after that; and therefore I do require you, as you will anſwer it at the dreadful day of judgment, that you will conſider it once again.

BRADSHAW. Sir, I have received direction from the court.

KING. Well, ſir.

BRADSHAW. If this muſt be re-inforced, or any thing of this nature, your anſwer muſt be the ſame; and they will proceed to ſentence, if you have nothing more to ſay.

KING. Sir, I have nothing more to ſay; but I ſhall deſire, that what I have ſaid may be entered.

BRADSHAW. The court then, ſir, has ſomething to ſay unto you; which, altho' I know it will be very unacceptable, yet notwithſtanding they are willing, and are reſolved to diſcharge their duty.

[Then Bradſhaw went on in a long harangue, indeavoring to juſtify their proceedings, miſapplying law and hiſtory, and raking up and wreſting whatſoever he thought fit for his purpoſe, alleging the examples of former treaſons and rebellions, both at home and abroad, as authentic proofs; and concluding, That the King was a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy to the common-wealth of England.

His Majeſty, having] with his wonted patience heard all theſe reproaches, anſwered, Nalſon.]

KING. I would deſire only one word before you give ſentence; and that is, That you would hear me concerning thoſe great imputations which you have laid to my charge.

BRADSHAW. Sir, you muſt give me now leave to go on; for I am not far from your ſentence, and your time is now paſſed.

KING. But I ſhall deſire you will hear me a few words to you: for truly, whatever ſentence you will put upon me in reſpect of thoſe heavy imputations which I ſee by your ſpeech you have put upon me; ſir, it is very true, that ———

BRADSHAW. Sir, I muſt put you in mind. Truly, ſir, I would not willingly, at this time eſpecially, interrupt you in any thing you have to ſay, which is proper for us to admit of; but, ſir, you have not owned us as a court, and you look upon us as a ſort of people met together; and we know what language we receive from your party.

KING. I know nothing of that.

BRADSHAW. You diſavow us as a court; and therefore for you to addreſs yourſelf to us, not to acknowledge us as a court to judge of what you ſay, it is not be permited. And the truth is, all along, from the firſt time you were pleaſed to diſavow and diſown us, the court needed not to have heard you one word: for, unleſs they be acknowledged a court, and ingaged, it is not proper for you to ſpeak. Sir, we have given you too much liberty already, and admited of too much delay; and we may not admit of any farther. Were it proper for us to do, we ſhould hear you freely, and we ſhould not have declined to have heard you, at large, what you could have ſaid or proved on your behalf, whether for totally excuſing, or for in part excuſing thoſe great and heinous charges which, in whole or in part, are laid upon you. But, ſir, I ſhall trouble you no longer; your ſins are of ſo large a dimenſion, that if you do but ſeriouſly think of them, they will drive you to a ſad conſideration, and they may improve in you a ſad and ſerious repentance. And the court do heartily wiſh that you may be ſo penitent for what you have done amiſs, that God may have mercy, at leaſt wiſe upon your better part: truly, ſir, for the other, it is our parts and duties to do that which the law preſcribes: we are here not "jus dare," but "jus dicere." We cannot be unmindful of what the ſcripture tells us, "For to acquit the "guilty is of equal abomination, as to condemn the inno-"cent:" we may not acquit the guilty. What ſentence the law affirms to a traitor, tyrant, a murderer, and a public enemy to the country, that ſentence you are now to hear read unto you; and that is the ſentence of the court.

Make an O yes, and command ſilence while the ſentence is read.

Which done, the clerk read the ſentence, drawn up in parchment:

"WHereas the commons of England in parliament had "appointed them a High-court of Juſtice, for the "trial of Charles Stuart, King of England, before whom he "had been three times convened; and at the firſt time a "charge of high-treaſon, and other crimes and miſdemeanors, "was read in the behalf of the kingdom of England, &c."

Here the charge was repeated.

Which charge being read unto him, as afore ſaid, he, the ſaid Charles Stuart, was required to give his anſwer; but he refuſed ſo to do: expreſſing the ſeveral paſſages of his refuſing, in the former proceedings.

"For all which treaſons and crimes, this court doth ad-"judge, That he, the ſaid Charles Stuart, as a tyrant, trai-"tor, murderer, and a public enemy, ſhall be put to death, "by the ſevering of his head from his body."

Which being read, Bradſhaw added;

The ſentence now read and publiſhed, is the act, ſentence judgment and reſolution of the whole court.

To which they all expreſſed their aſſent by ſtanding up, as was before agreed and ordered.

His Majeſty then ſaid, Will you hear me a word, ſir?

BRADSHAW. Sir, you are not to be heard after the ſentence.

KING. No, Sir?

BRADSHAW. No, ſir; by your favor, ſir. Guard, withdraw your priſoner.

KING. I may ſpeak after ſentence, by your favor, ſir: I may ſpeak after ſentence, ever.

By your favor, (Hold!) the ſentence, ſir———I ſay, ſir, I do———

I am not ſuffered to ſpeak. Expect what juſtice other people will have.

His Majeſty being taken away by the guard, as he paſſed down the ſtairs, the inſolent ſoldiers ſcoffed at him, caſting the ſmoke of their tobacco (a thing very diſtaſteful to him) in his face, and throwing their pipes in his way; and one more inſolent inſolent than the reſt, ſpiting in his face, his Majeſty, according to his wonted heroic patience, took no more notice of ſo ſtrange and barbarous an indignity, than to wipe it off with his hankerchief.

As he paſſed along, hearing the rabble of ſoldiers crying out " Juſtice! Juſtice!" he ſaid, " Poor ſouls! for a piece " of money, they would do ſo for their commanders."

Being brought firſt to ſir Robert Cotton's, and thence to Whitehall, the ſoldiers continued their brutiſh carriage toward him, abuſing all who ſeemed to ſhew any reſpect, or any pity to him; not ſuffering him to reſt in his chamber, but thruſting in and ſmoking their tobacco, and diſturbing his privacy.

But thro' all theſe trials (unuſual to Princes) he paſſed with ſuch a calm and even temper, that he let fall nothing unbeſeeming his former majeſty and magnanimity.

In the evening a member of the army acquainted the commitee with his Majeſty's deſire, " That ſeeing they had paſſed " a ſentence of death upon him, and his time might be nigh, " he might ſee his children; and dr. Juxon, biſhop of Lon- " don, might be admited to aſſiſt him in his private devo- " tions, and receiving the ſacrament." Both which at length were granted.

And the next day, being Sunday, he was attended by the guard to St. James's; where thebiſhop preached before him upon theſe words, " In the day when God ſhall judge the ſe- " crets of all men by Jeſus Chriſt, according to my goſpel. Nalſon.]

Fifty-nine Commiſſioners preſent.

It was ordered, That the officers of the ordnance within the tower of London, or any other officer or officers of the ſtore within the ſaid tower, in whoſe hands or cuſtody is the bright execution-ax, for the executing malefactors, do forthwith deliver unto Edward Denby, eſq; ſerjeant at arms attending this court, or his deputy or deputies, the ſaid ax. And for their or either of their ſo doing, this ſhall be their warrant.

" To col. John White, or any other officer within the tower " of London, whom it concerns."

The court adjourned 'till to-morrow morning at nine.

Martis, 30 Jan. 1648. Painted-chamber.

Commiſſioners meet.

Ordered, That mr. Marſhall, mr. Nye, mr. Caryl, mr. Salway, and mr. Dell, be deſired to attend the King, to adminiſter to him thoſe ſpiritual helps as ſhould be ſuitable to his preſent condition. And lieutenant-colonel Goffe is deſired forthwith to repair unto them for that purpoſe.

Who did ſo; but after informed the court, That the King, being acquainted therewith, refuſed to confer with them; expreſſing, that he would not be troubled with them.

Ordered, That the ſcaffold upon which the King was to be executed, be covered with black.

The biſhop of London read divine ſervice before his Majeſty, and the twenty-ſeventh of St. Matthew, the hiſtory of our Saviour's paſſion, being appointed by the church for that day, he gave the biſhop thanks for his ſeaſonable choice of the leſſon; but the biſhop acquainting him, that it was the ſervice of the day, it comforted him exceedingly; then he proceeded to receive the holy ſacrament. His devotions being ended, he was brought from St. James's to Whitehall, by a regiment of foot, beſide his private guard of partizans; the biſhop of London on the one hand, and colonel Tomlinſon, who had the charge of him, on the other, bare-headed. The guards marching a ſlow pace, the King bid them go faſter, ſaying, that he now went before them to ſtrive for a heavenly crown. Being come to the end of the park, he went up the ſtairs leading to the long gallery in Whitehall, where formerly he uſed to lodge, and there finding an unexpected delay, the ſcaffold being not ready, he paſſed moſt of the time in prayer. About twelve (his Majeſty having eat a bit of bread, and drank a glaſs of claret) colonel Hacker, with other officers and ſoldiers, brought the King, with the biſhop and colonel Tomlinſon, thro' the banqueting-houſe, to the ſcaffold. A ſtrong guard of ſeveral regiments of horſe and foot were planted on all ſides, which hindered the near approach of the people, and the King from being heard, and therefore he chiefly directed his ſpeech to the biſhop and colonel Tomlinſon, as follows:

" I Shall be very little heard of any body elſe; I ſhall there- " fore ſpeak a word to you here. Indeed, I could hold my " peace very well, if I did not think, that holding my peace " would make ſome men think, that I did ſubmit to the guilt, " as well as the puniſhment: but I think it is my duty to God " and my country to clear myſelf, both as an honeſt man, a " good King, and a good chriſtian. I ſhall begin firſt with " my innocency; in troth, I think it not very needful to in- " ſiſt long upon this; for all the world knows, that I did never " begin a war with the two houſes of parliament; and I call " God to witneſs, to whom I muſt ſhortly make an account, " that I did never intend to incroach upon their privileges; " they began upon me. It is the militia they began upon; they

" they confeſſed the militia was mine, but they thought fit to " have it from me: and, to be ſhort, if any body will look " to the dates of commiſſions, of their commiſſions and mine, " and likewiſe to the declarations, he will ſee clearly that they " began theſe troubles, not I. So that as for the guilt of theſe " enormous crimes which are laid againſt me, I hope in God, " that God will clear me of. I will not, I am in charity, and " God forbid I ſhould lay it upon the two houſes of parlia- " ment, there is no neceſſity of either: I hope they are free " of this guilt; for I believe that ill inſtruments between them " and me, have been the cauſe of all this bloodſhed; ſo that " as I find myſelf clear of this, I hope, and pray God, that " they may too: Yet, for all this, God forbid I ſhould be ſo ill " a chriſtian, as not to ſay God's judgments are juſt upon me. " Many times he does pay juſtice by an unjuſt ſentence, that is " ordinary. I will only ſay this, that an unjuſt ſentence, which " I ſuffered to take effect, is puniſhed now by an unjuſt ſen- " tence upon me: So far I have ſaid to ſhew you, that I am " an innocent man.

" Now, to ſhew you that I am a good chriſtian, I hope " there is a good man [pointing to biſhop Juxon] that will " bear me witneſs, that I have forgiven all the world, and even " thoſe in particular, that have been the chief cauſes of my " death; who they are, God knows; I do not deſire to know: " I pray God forgive them. But this is not all, my charity " muſt go farther; I wiſh that they may repent. For, indeed, " they have committed a great ſin in that particular. I pray " God, with St. Stephen, that it be not laid to their charge; " nay, not only ſo, but that they may take the right way to " the peace of the kingdom; for my charity commands me " not only to forgive particular men, but to indeavor, to the " laſt gaſp, the peace of the kingdom. So, ſirs, I do wiſh, " with all my ſoul (I hope there are ſome here that will carry " it farther) and indeavor the peace of the kingdom. Now, " ſirs, I muſt ſhew you both how you are out of the way, " and will put you in the way. Firſt, you are out of the way, " for certainly all the ways you ever had yet, as I could find " by any thing, is in the way of conqueſt; certainly this is an " ill way; for conqueſt, ſirs, in my opinion, is never juſt, " except there be a good and juſt cauſe, either for matter of " wrong, or a juſt title; and then, if you go beyond the firſt " quarrel, that makes that unjuſt at the end which was juſt at " firſt; if there be only matter of conqueſt, then it is a great " robbery, as a pirate ſaid to Alexander, That he was a great " robber, he was but a petty robber. And ſo, ſirs, I think " the way you are in is much out of the way. Now, ſirs, to " put you in the way, believe it, you ſhall never go right, " nor God will never proſper you, until you give God his due, " the King his due (that is, my ſucceſſor) and the people their " due; I am as much for them as any of you. You muſt " give God his due, by regulating rightly his church (accord- " ing to the ſcripture) which is now out of order; to ſet you " in a way particularly now, I cannot; but only this, A na- " tional ſynod freely called, freely debated among themſelves, " muſt ſettle this, when every opinion is freely heard. For " the King [then turning to a gentleman that touched the ax, he ſaid, " Hurt not the ax, that may hurt me.] Indeed, I will " not—— the laws of the land will clearly inſtruct you for that; " therefore, becauſe it concerns my own particular, I ſhall " only give you a touch of it. For the people, truly I deſire " their liberty and freedom as much as any body whatſoever; " but I muſt tell you, that their liberty and freedom conſiſt in " having government, thoſe laws by which their lives and " their goods may be moſt their own. It is not their having " a ſhare in the government, that is nothing appertaining to " them: a ſubject, and a ſovereign, are clean different things; " and therefore until you do that, I mean, that you put the " people in that liberty, as I ſay, certainly they will never " enjoy themſelves.

" Sirs, it was for this that now I am come here; if I would " have given way to an arbitrary way, to have all laws changed " according to the power of the ſword, I needed not to have " come here; and therefore I tell you (and I pray God it be " not laid to your charge) that I am the martyr of the people. " In troth, ſirs, I ſhall not hold you much longer: I ſhall " only ſay this to you, That I could have deſired a little time " longer, becauſe I would have a little better digeſted this I " have ſaid, and therefore I hope you will excuſe me; I have " delivered my conſcience, I pray God you take thoſe courſes " that are the beſt for the good of the kingdom and your ſal- " vation.

BISHOP. Tho' your Majeſty's affections may be very well known, as to religion; yet it may be expected, that you ſhould ſay ſomething thereof to the world's ſatisfaction.

KING. " I thank you heartily, my lord, for I had almoſt " forgotten it. In troth, ſirs, my conſcience in religion, I " think, is very well known to all the world; and therefore I " declare before you all, that I die a chriſtian, according to " the profeſſion of the church of England, as I found it left me " by my father; and this honeſt man, I think, will witneſs it."

Then turning to the officers, he ſaid, " Sirs, excuſe me for " this ſame: I have a good cauſe, and I have a gracious God, " I will ſay no more."

Then to colonel Hacker he ſaid, " Take care that they do " not put me to pain: and, ſir, this and it pleaſe you"——

But a gentleman coming near the ax, the King ſaid, " Take " heed of the ax, pray take heed of the ax."

Then ſpeaking to the executioner, he ſaid, " I ſhall ſay but " very ſhort prayers, and when I thruſt out my hands"——

Then he called to the biſhop for his night-cap, and having put it on, he ſaid to the executioner, " Does my hair trouble " you?" who deſired him to put it all under his cap, which the King did accordingly, by the help of the executioner and the biſhop. Then turning to dr. Juxon, he ſaid, " I have a " good cauſe and a gracious God on my ſide."

BISHOP. There is but one ſtage more, this ſtage is but turbulent and troubleſome, it is a ſhort one; but you may conſider it will ſoon carry you from earth to heaven; and there you will find a great deal of cordial joy and comfort.

KING. " I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, " where no diſturbance can be, no diſturbance in the world."

BISHOP. You are exchanged from a temporary to an eternal crown, a good exchange.

Then the King ſaid to the executioner, " Is my hair well?" And took off his cloak and his george, giving his george to the biſhop, ſaying, " Remember." Then he put off his doublet, and being in his waiſtcoat, he put on his cloak again; then looking upon the block, he ſaid to the executioner, " You muſt ſet " it faſt."

EXECUTIONER. It is faſt, ſir.

KING. " When I put out my hands this way (ſtretching them " out) then"——After that, having ſaid two or three words to himſelf, as he ſtood with his hands and eyes lift up, immediately ſtooping down, he laid his neck upon the block. And then the executioner again puting his hair under his cap, the King thinking he had been going to ſtrike, ſaid, " Stay for the ſign."

EXECUTIONER. Yes, I will, and it pleaſe your Majeſty. After a little pauſe, the King ſtretching forth his hands, the executioner, at one blow, ſevered his head from his body, and held it up and ſhewed it to the people, ſaying, " Behold the head of " a traitor." At the inſtant when the blow was given, there was a diſmal univerſal groan among the people; and as ſoon as the execution was over, one troop of horſe marched immediately from Charing-croſs to King-ſtreet, and another from King-ſtreet to Charing-croſs, on purpoſe to diſperſe and ſcatter the people. The corpſe was put into a coffin, and the biſhop and mr. Herbert went with it to the back-ſtairs to have it imbalmed; after imbalming, his head was ſewed on, and the corpſe was wrapt in lead, and the coffin covered with a velvet pall, and then removed to St. James's. Mr. Herbert then made application to ſuch as were in power, that it might be interred in Henry VII's chapel; but it was denied, for that his burying there would attract infinite numbers of all ſorts thither; which, as the times then were, was judged unſafe and inconvenient. Mr. Herbert acquainting the biſhop with this, they then reſolved to bury the King's body in the Royal-chapel of St. George, within the caſtle of Windſor, both in regard that his Majeſty was Sovereign of the moſt noble order of the garter, and that ſeveral Kings had been there interred; viz. King Henry VI, Edward IV, and Henry VIII; upon which conſideration, the commitee of parliament was addreſſed to the ſecond time, who, after ſome deliberation, gave orders, bearing date, February ſix, 1648, authoriſing mr. Herbert, and mr. Anthony Mildmay, to bury the King's body there. Accordingly the corpſe was carried thither from St. James's, February ſeven, in a hearſe covered with black velvet, drawn by ſix horſes covered with black cloth, and attended by about a dozen gentlemen.

The King's ſtatue was afterwards taken down from the Royal Exchange in London, where it was ſet up again by the city in the year 1682, to curry favor with King Charles II. when their charter was threatened.
